VOL. XXII. NO. 45. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1862. WHOLE NO. 1,137.

National Anti-Slavery Standard.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY, ON SATURDAY.

AT TWO DOLLARS PER ANNUM,

BY THE

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY,

At its Office, No. 5 Beekman Street, New York,

AND AT THE OFFICE OF THE

PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY,

106 North-Tenth Street, Philadelphia.

Letters for publication, or relating in any way to the editorial department, should be addressed, "EDITOR NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD, NEW YORK." Letters enclosing subscriptions, or relating in any way to the business affairs of the Paper, should be addressed, "THE TREASURER OF THE NATIONAL ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD, NEW YORK."

ADVERTISEMENTS, 10 cents per line each insertion.

Selections.

THE WAY TO SAVE THE COUNTRY.

[Extract from GERRIT SMITH'S Speech, delivered in Washington, D. C., March 11, 1862.]

Do you ask how the country can be saved? The answer is at hand: Stop all your other fighting, and begin at the rebels. Another answer is also at hand: Stop taking counsel of Kentucky, and take counsel of the nation. I am not prejudiced against Kentucky. I love her. I have gazed with delight upon her surpassingly rich blue grass fields, and the fine breeds of cattle grazing upon them. I have rejoiced her unstinted hospitality. I have conversed with her fascinating Henry Clay, and with others of her great men. I acknowledge the eminent bravery of her people. Nevertheless, I cannot admit that the advice of Kentucky should be taken in this war. It can but lead to destruction. For this is a war which has brought upon us. Hence a slave State—a State which is still under the infatuating power of slavery—is not fit to give advice in it. Anti-slavery men, and anti-slavery men only, are fit to shape your policy against a proslavery war. Indeed, the very best counsellors we could have at this juncture are such men as Garrison and Phillips, and Bryant and Smith, and Tyng and Cheever, and Frederick Douglass. You need men in your national councils at this time who know all about slavery—men who have made the matter their life-study. Drunkards know little of drunkenness. Their very drunkenness disables them from knowing much of it. It is the clear-eyed Temperance men who know all about it. Slaveholders know little of slavery. Their very slaveholding disables them from knowing much of it. They are the blinded victims—scarcely less blinded than their fellow-victims, the slaves. It is the clear-eyed Abolitionists who know all about it. Had Hamilton, Jefferson, or any of the whiskey-makers and whiskey-drinkers, you would not have gone to distillers and drunkards for counsel how to resist and conquer it. But, as well might you as to make slaveholders and drivers against the slaveholding rebellion. So far from our heeding the advice of Kentucky how to save the nation, most emphatically does she need our advice how to save herself. What is the one thing which has set her people at loggerheads? The one thing which has set her people at loggerheads with themselves? The one thing which she does not see it. What is the one thing which would have kept the war without her borders? Just that which has kept it out of the contiguous States of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois—Anti-Slavery! Just that which would have kept out every battle then stone-blind, the statesmen of Kentucky would instantly see that, in protecting and cherishing slavery, they are protecting and cherishing the viper which is stinging her to death. Were it resolved by other States than a proslavery war such able and admired men as Crittenden and Davis, Guthrie and Holt would be competent to give us valuable counsel. But as a proof how unfit even such a high-minded gentleman as Garrett Davis is to counsel us in this war, he proposes on the floor of the Senate to have some of the best and noblest men in the land put to death, simply because they are opposed to slavery. To say the least, he betrays great weakness in this. As he is my representative, and perhaps intimal to me, I will call it nothing worse than weakness. The general principle, which forbids the trusting of Kentucky wisdom in this crisis, is: "Never trust a person in a matter where his interest is against you, and especially if the matter be such that he has reduced by that interest." For illustration—should Polygamy get up a rebellion against our government, do not only largely on the help of Brigham Young to put it down. He would be the last to proclaim war against

National Anti-Slavery Standard,

WITHOUT CONCEALMENT—WITHOUT COMPROMISE.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1862.

CORRESPONDENTS will greatly oblige us by a careful observance of the following directions, viz.:

Letters containing matter for publication, or relating in any way to the editorial conduct of the paper, should be addressed, "EDITOR OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD, No. 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK."

Letters enclosing subscriptions, or relating in any way to the business of the office, should be addressed, "PUBLISHER OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD, No. 5 BEEKMAN STREET, NEW YORK."

WHERE WE ARE.

EVENTS are hurrying forward, undeniably, either to good or ill issues. The last two or three weeks have been crowded with them as they rushed through our world. And it was high time that they began to move, for the world was beginning to be tired of waiting, and much longer delay might have been as disastrous to the nation, at home and abroad, as defeat itself. The successes of the National arms have tended to narrow the circumference of the rebellion, and to bring it within more manageable limits. The victories at Fort Henry, Fort Donelson and Newbern, the occupation of Nashville, the evacuation by the enemy of Columbus, the capture of New Madrid, and the expulsion of Price from Missouri, promise well for the speedy opening of the upper Missi-sippi; while the abandonment of Florida and the evacuation of Pensacola, if this last piece of intelligence be indeed true—which it soon must be if not yet—make the occupation of New Orleans and the restoration of the whole of that great highway of the West to the ocean to the commerce of the world, a mere question of time, and of brief time. Then the time has at last arrived when Gen. McClellan thinks it possible to advance, or impossible to remain longer behind. A very short space of time will suffice to show whether the suspicions which have thrown doubts upon his heartiness in his work, and which have made him the idol of the pro-slavery men of all parties, are well grounded or not. We shall soon know whether his loyalty to Slavery or to the Nation is supreme. We will hope the best, and will content to confess ourselves in the wrong for any share in these imputations we may have helped to cast upon his thoroughness of purpose, should he prove himself in earnest in the field, and as ready to make slavery subordinate to victory. If he will but kill this rebellion by dealing a death-blow at its only vital part, at the black heart which sends all the venomous blood that gives it life through all its veins, or even by not warding it off, we will acknowledge him as the worthy successor of Washington, who has finished the work Washington had only begun; and we do not care how soon he steps, like Washington, from the saddle of the Commander-in-chief to the chair of the President of the United States.

We do not believe, however, that he is going on conquering and to conquer in the triumphant manner which is sometimes augured from the retiring of the enemy from their advanced posts as far as Manassas. It was military policy rather than military necessity that counselled that falling back. The farther our armies are drawn into the heart of the enemy's country, and the farther they are placed from their base of operations when the fighting really begins, the greater the disadvantage at which the fighting will be done. The positions at Gordonsville and along the valley of the Rappahannock are said to be as strong for a stand as those at Manassas, and they are of course much more favorable to the success of the enemy. We believe that Gen. McClellan, if thoroughly in earnest, as one should infer from the tone of his address to his army that he is, if words mean anything, with the immense force at his command, and the unlimited supplies of all kinds which the nation has poured out at his feet, that with all these advantages he must prevail over the enemy in the end. But it will not be without hard fighting, close lives. And it may not be without some repulses and disasters at first that he will reach the rebel Capital. Though it is absurd to say that every Southern soldier is equal to five Northern ones, it is true that they are about equally good man for man, and that the Southern men have a Concretion to fight for and not an Abstraction. A slave, and the right to own and use him, is a positive thing, and a privilege which, brought up as the Southern men are, is worth fighting for, and it is one that enlists the strongest passions of the human heart on its side. The Union and Constitution, on the contrary, however much the Northern men have been brought up to respect them, are but political ideas which can excite no enthusiasm or passion on the part of those who stand up for them, only the sense of duty to maintain them as good and profitable arrangements. The one side has all the energy of passion and of hatred towards their antagonists, the other has no such intense springs of action, and may meet with rebuffs from not making sufficient allowance for them. If any one, soldier or civilian, expects that the army of the Potomac will be transformed into the army of the Jermen without fierce fighting and great loss of life, we fear he will find himself much in the wrong.

While we wait patiently to see whether Gen. McClellan intends to show How to Do It or How Not to Do It, we are even now at liberty to pass judgment on the way in which Not Doing It was organized at Fortress Monroe. When it was known that the Merrimac was in the course of metamorphosis into the impregnable iron monster she has shown herself to be, and when Mr. Ellet, months ago, had prophesied the exact fate of last Saturday and Sunday week, and when it must have been known that she was about ready to enter on her career, but one steam-frigate and two sailing vessels, and one of those without a crew, were left to guard that vital point! Had it not been for the opportune arrival of the Monitor, the creation of a private citizen, pooh-poohed by all the regular navy, the Minnesota would have shared the fate of the Cumberland and the Congress, and, if Fortress Monroe had been able to withstand her assault, the whole blockading squadron would certainly have been swept from the surface of the sea or into its depths. And the Assistant Secretary of the Navy was on the spot to order the Monitor to another port! while her crew was strictly forbidden to use the wrought iron halls which, her officers fully believed, would have sunk the Merrimac! The French have a proverb that there is a special providence for drunkards, and we may infer from our narrow escape on the 8th and 9th of March, that there must be such a Providence that watches over careless nations. The loss of the two frigates, excepting the sad loss of life, were worth more than the capture of Forts Henry and Donelson to the nation, if it have aroused it to a sense of what is demanded for the protection of its ports and cities. As far as that sea-fight was concerned, it is vain to deny that the enemy had the best of it. He sunk one frigate, burnt another, crippled a third, and held a long and desperate conflict with the anomalous iron-monster that ventured to grapple with it in close encounter. The narrow escape we had there must needs teach us a lesson of wisdom worth twenty victories. Our reverse at Bull Run was caused by our contempt for our adversaries, and so was that in Hampton Roads. Our martinet naval officers had no belief in a naval invention which had never come under their routine notice, and the consequence of their little faith was all but the destruction of our entire fleet. Bull Run was, perhaps, the greatest blessing that has befallen the country since the war began. Perhaps the naval disaster off Old Point Comfort may be the second, if it be well laid to heart and put to good uses. It must make us feel how slight are the circumstances that cause or prevent the most decisive events, and how essential it is to be wisely ready.

But simultaneously with these fortunate untoward events, have occured others to which history never can attribute a malign influence. We mean the Act of Congress forbidding negro-catching on the part of our military and naval officers, and the Message of the President of which we spoke last week. They are, both of them, valuable in themselves, but more valuable as signs of the times. It is a blessed circumstance that our soldiers can no more be degraded by Stones or Dwights to offices which none but the meanest of Southern whites will stoop to; but it is more blessed yet that so wholesome a public opinion exists at the North as should compel such a prohibition. The President's Message, in itself, is not much to brag of, as we showed last week. It does not approach the true, high table-ground of absolute right and justice. It is right that its short-comings should be pointed out and that it should be tried by the test of the perfect rights of Nature and Reason. But we must hail with satisfaction the first utterance from the high places of the nation, acknowledging that slavery may be something that it is well to be rid of. It is the first time such an idea has ever emanated from the White House, and it is an era in the history of the country and the race. We fully admit and accept all the humiliation contained in such an avowal; but we claim all the comfort and encouragement that can be drawn from it. Though not conclusive of itself, it denotes many a foregone conclusion. It indicates the state of public feeling at the North and in the Border States. We may be sure the President would not have ventured on so bold a word had he not known where it would find an echo. May we not hope, too, that it is a hint of what his prophetic soul feels instinctively to be at hand? If Slavery must come down in order that the Union may stand, may it not be that he is thus preparing the way before him, and warning the nominally loyal States to prepare for the wrath to come? At any rate, it is a ray of light let shine in a place where the blackness of darkness has ever reigned thus far, and this by the hand of a man unquestionably honest and sincere, even where mistaken. We admit the absurdity of paying men for making their fortunes for them—for this is the amount of compensating men for ridding them of slavery. The lands in all the Border States, in all the slave States indeed, would be worth more without slavery than the land with the slaves on it. But from the time that we first proclaimed Immediate Emancipation the Hight of the Slave and the Duty of the Master, we have believed that when the time actually came when slavery was no longer worth keeping, the North would have to pay the slaveholders for putting money in their pockets through Emancipation. Slavery will be no longer worth keeping when it is no longer the controlling element of political power. Notwithstanding the pro-slavery virulence of some Border State men, they will not be long in seeing where their true interest lies. And should the rebellion be thoroughly subdued, even without compulsory Emancipation as the price, we shall soon see the cotton States suing for the like remedy and relief. In our victories and our defeats, in the voice of the President, in the action of Congress and in the responses of the press, we thank God that we discern that we stand further forward by much than we did a month ago.

CHRONICLES OF THE LATTER DAYS.

MEN and brethren, ye know how that, in the days of old, when Pharaoh was ruler over Egypt, the oppressions of that land were great, and the cry of them went up to Heaven!

Insomuch that the Lord sent his servant Moses to cry aloud before Pharaoh, saying, Thus saith the Lord—Let my people go, that they may serve me.

And Pharaoh hardened his heart, and mocked, and spoke blasphemous words, saying—Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? And he would not let the people go.

Then, behold, there came divers plagues from the Lord upon that ruler, and upon his land; the plague of blood, and the plague of fire, and the dying of much cattle, and many more grievous plagues. Nevertheless, Pharaoh still hardened his heart, and would not let the

Then the first-born son of the ruler, even of Pharaoh, died; and many of the children of the people died also.

Then the people of the land of Egypt lifted up their voice, and cried aloud unto the ruler that he should do that which the Lord had said.

And Pharaoh was sore afraid, and he gave consent that it should be as they required. And they let the people go.

Howbeit, the ruler again hardened his heart, and went out with chariots, and horses, and a great army, to bring the people back; but the Lord overthrew him, and all his host, in the Red sea.

Ye know, men and brethren, that these things were in the days of old, even in former times.

Now it came to pass in the latter days, that one Abraham who dwelt in Egypt (howbeit, he was born in the land of the South, even in Kentucky), was called of the people to rule over that land, and over all the region round about it.

Now the land was very great, and the people were many; and their heart was lifted up, and they spoke one to another, saying—Surely this is a great country!

Howbeit, their wickedness also was great. For they oppressed the Lord's people, even his poor, and his little ones, and bound heavy burdens upon them, and scourged them sore, and drove them to cruel labors, and took away from them the key of knowledge, and seized their wives and daughters for a prey, and bought and sold them in the market as cattle.

And they continually cursed and reviled the Lord's little ones, calling them (in the speech of that land) damned niggers. Yea, damned niggers called they them.

Now this people, both they and their rulers, had done evil in the sight of the Lord for many days, even exceeding the oppressions of the former land of Egypt.

And the Lord saw it, and was wroth, and had brought a great plague upon that people, even before Abraham was called from his low estate (for he had been aforetime a cutter and carver of wood) to be their ruler.

Now when Abraham was exalted to be a prince and a ruler, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying—Speak unto this people, and say unto them, Let my people go, that they may serve me!

But Abraham would not.

Then the Lord sent more plagues, even as when Pharaoh, the former ruler of Egypt, hardened his heart.

Again he sent blood, and fire, and the death of much cattle; and many of the people also suddenly died.

But Abraham hardened his heart, and refrained still, and held his peace.

Then the son of the ruler, even of Abraham, died also.

And the word of the Lord came again unto Abraham, saying, How long will this nation refuse to obey my voice? Delay not, arise quickly, and make Proclamation unto them, saying—Let my people go, that they may serve me!

But Abraham refrained still, and held his peace.

For he said within himself—Surely the men of the South, who do these oppressions, are my own kinsfolk, and are of the kindred of Sarah my wife; and the men of Egypt also uphold these oppressions. Moreover, if I do that which the Lord hath said, the men of the Border will hate me, and fall away from me.

And while Abraham held his peace, the plagues from the Lord waxed more and more grievous; and many of the people murmured, saying to their ruler—

Behold, we all dead men. How long delayest thou to do that which is commanded of the Lord? Arise quickly and make Proclamation, as he hath said.

And after Abraham had yet again delayed, saying, Of a verity, this thing is too hard for me—he considered with himself, and spoke unto the elders and the great Council, even they who governed the people under him;

And he said unto these elders—speak ye unto the people for me (if it seem good in your eyes), and speak moderate and careful words to them, even the speech called gradualism, lest they do the Lord's work too hastily.

After this manner, therefore, speak ye, to those of our peoples and tribes among whom "the peculiar institution" is established. Say ye unto them—

If it shall seem good in the eyes of any of you (for we would not that all should do it) to make a beginning of doing some small part of that which the Lord hath said (for we would not that ye should do the whole of it), then will we pay unto you shekels of gold and shekels of silver, "to compensate for the inconvenience, public and private," of doing that which the Lord hath said.

(For such was the manner of the speech called gradualism.)

Now there was in that land a prophet named Garrison, and in another part of it (for verily it was a great country) another prophet named Cheever. And these both had for many years testified vehemently against the evil speech called gradualism.

Of a truth they cried aloud, they spared not, they lifted up their voices like the trumpet, they showed to the ruler and the elders their transgressions, and to the people of the land their sins.

Yet hearkened they not unto them, neither the ruler, nor the elders, nor the people.

And the Lord beheld all these things, and a book of remembrance was written before him.

It was written how Abraham, the ruler, had oftimes disobeyed the voice of the Lord, and had held back the people from obeying him.

It was written how the elders had hearkened unto the ruler more than unto the Lord, and had uttered the evil speech called gradualism, and had joined in holding back the people from doing that which the Lord had said.

Moreover, it was written how the people clove unto their oppressions, and followed the counsel of wicked rulers, and turned away from the path of righteousness, and said unto the prophets, Prophesy not.

Also it was written how, at last, the anger of the Lord came upon them, and smote them with sore plagues, instead of breaking off from their sins by righteousness.

[illegible] to [illegible] It was called gradualism.

[illegible]

WENDELL PHILLIPS IN WASHINGTON.

THE visit to Washington, within the last week, of WENDELL PHILLIPS, the peerless champion of Abolitionism, is an event of striking significance, marking, as it unmistakably does, the wonderful change of public sentiment which has taken place since the opening of the present war. Only fifteen months since, Mr. Phillips could speak in Boston only at the peril of his life; now his most radical views are enthusiastically applauded, night after night, by audiences filling the largest lecture hall at the slaveholding Capital; he even goes over the Potomac, and speaks to Massachusetts soldiers on the "sacred soil" of the Old Dominion; the rules of the Senate and House of Representatives are waived to admit him on their floors, and the most distinguished legislators of the country eagerly bestow upon him more usually reserved for those who have filled the highest public stations; the Speaker of the House invites him to dinner; and the President of the United States invites him to an interview. Incidents like these are trifling in themselves, but when the long proscribed champion of an unpopular but righteous cause suddenly becomes the recipient of such attentions, they are worthy of mention as indications that the cause is approaching its triumph.

Some of the incidents of Mr. Phillips's visit are fitly mentioned by our Washington correspondent; others are recorded in the following dispatches:

From The Tribune.

Washington, March 14.—A year ago Wendell Phillips would have been sacrificed to the devil of slavery anywhere on Pennsylvania avenue. To-day he was interrupted in his lecture on the floor of the Senate. The Vice-President left his seat and greeted him with marked respect. The attentions of Senators to the apostle of Abolition have the most flattering character. Marvellous conquest of prejudices, and marvellous movement of Northern ideas.

Listening to Wendell Phillips's lecture this evening, in the Smithsonian Institute, were Senator Powell of Kentucky, and many other Southern men of note, and the Vice-President of the United States, and Congressmen of both Houses thickly sat about the orator on the platform.

Washington, March 16.—Speaker Grow entertained Wendell Phillips at dinner last night. The other guests were Vice-President and lad Mrs. Hamlin, and Mrs. Fremont, and Senator Sumner. To-day Mr. Phillips went to Alexandria at the invitation of several officers, and addressed the soldiery.

Washington, March 17. [illegible] the 14th inst. [illegible] Senate [illegible] the bill for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. In the evening he delivered his lecture on Toussaint L'Ouverture. The effect of this lecture was indescribable. It was a biography of the warrior statesman as well as a magnificent tribute to the ability of the black race and its capacity for self-government. Many of his episodes were of the most eloquent and impressive character, and his comparison of the Haytian patriot with Cromwell and Napoleon was greeted with unbounded applause. He had a large audience, and his lecture was pronounced one of the greatest efforts of his life.

The honors paid to Mr. Phillips in Washington are so much "gall and wormwood" to the pro-slavery party. They stand amazed and dumbfounded before such indications of the growth of the cause which they have so long scoffed at and maligned. The satanic Herald, which lately bawled itself hoarse in calling upon the government to send Phillips and his associates to Fort Lafayette, and only succeeded in getting its own principal editor sent to Fort Lafayette, now pronounced as a spy, makes a dismal attempt to belch up in such paragraphs as the following:

"NOW AND THEN.—Some twelve months since Wendell Phillips was near being mobbed in Boston for one of his abolition harangues. On Friday last an address of a similar character, delivered by him in Washington, was listened to with the most perfect equanimity. The Tribune contrasts these facts as evidencing the progress that abolitionist has made. Sage conclusion! Quite not our mole-eyed contemporary see that twelve months ago the nation had a vague dread of these fanatics? Now does it see that, done what worst, they entertain for them only a feeling of contempt?

It is not "twelve months," but less than three, since The Herald, inspired by its "vague dread" of Mr. Phillips, attempted to excite a mob to prevent him from speaking in this city! The result showed how impotent was its malignity, and since that time it has made itself ridiculous by feigning indifference to the movements of the "abolition fanatics." It continues reminds us of the man who, as the waters of Noah's flood were raging and roaring around him, sought admission to the ark, and being refused, cried out, "Get along with your old ark—I don't believe there's going to be much of a shower, after all."

POOR, AND YET RICH!

NEW JERSEY, Feb. 17, 1862.

MR. OLIVER JOHNSON—Dear Sir: Hoping against hope, and mortified with the necessity, I have too long delayed writing. At 61, laboring with spine disease, contracted in earlier struggles with the giant fiend Poverty, I yet, a year ago, ventured to involve myself pecuniarily by adding a few acres to my little homestead. Obligations are now due which I cannot cancel, and I am at the mercy of those who menace me with prosecution. I must curtail my slender enjoyments, among which stand preeminent THE ANTI SLAVERY STANDARD. If I get easier in my affairs, I will renew it. I think I never have, and cannot now, give for personal comforts a dollar which lawfully belongs to another man. Yet, since I subscribed to Cyrus Burleigh for THE STANDARD, it has afforded me a richer supply of the "bread of life" than any other source except the Bible, and has given me besides a blessed communion with bright and pure spirits of just men and women, made perfect through persecution and trials of faith, and love and labor and patience, and childlike, willing obedience to the divine teaching.

But enough. Stop paper for the present; and I hope in due time you will hear a better account from me.

I remain, yours to promote all just reforms and endless human progress.

[illegible]

No, friend ——, we can't stop your paper. We can't afford to lose so appreciative a reader. Besides, a friend at our elbow assumes the responsibility of the subscription for the present.—Editor.

MRS. BROWNING'S latest poems, hitherto uncollected, together with a memorial of her life, character and works by THEODORE TILTON, will shortly be published by James Miller & Co. of this city.

SHEPHERDS AND SHEEP.

A SERMON,

BY REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

Preached on Sunday Morning, New York, March 16, 1862.

Jesus said to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my lambs.—JOHN XXI. 15.

THERE is an old tradition, that, when the persecution began to rage in Rome, threatening to cut off the chief men in the young Church, the disciples crowded round Peter and begged him to leave the city and save a life which was so precious to the whole Christian community. The apostle, after vain remonstrances with them, yielded at last to their pleading, and, bidding his flock an affectionate adieu, wended his solitary way along the Appian road. He had proceeded but a few rods from the gates, when he met, coming toward him, pale and travel-worn and sad, his Lord Jesus. "Whither goest thou, my Master?" said Peter. "I go to Rome," was the reply. "And wherefore to Rome?" "To be crucified." The sting of the rebuke entered the apostle's heart. He went back to the city, told the vision to his friends, gave them his blessing, and met his fate, being crucified, at his own request, with his head downwards. Thus he fulfilled his Master's charge. Thus he fed the sheep with his own broken body. And here are we, in this far-off fold of a country and a race then unknown, pasturing on the soul of Peter.

They who think of Jesus most honorably, as well as most tenderly, think of him as the Good Shepherd; not as the princely Head of the great kingdom; not as the High Priest, making intercession for an outcast people, and appeasing an alienated God by the sacrifice of his own blood; not as the Prophet of the Law, announcing the Supreme Will; not as the Divine Teacher, bringing the heavenly truth before uncrevealed—[illegible] f men. They think of him as [illegible] by his own, as calling them by [illegible] em forth; as seeking those who [illegible] ake them his; giving their lives into [illegible] g the idolaters and misbelievers, [illegible] p; as finding them in the sloughs and pits and ravines and bramble thickets, and bringing them home "with torn fleeces, and eyes full of fear"; carrying the lambs in his bosom, and the wounded on his shoulder; never asking why they had wandered, only pitying them because they had, and pitying them most who had wandered furthest, who had lost their way most hopelessly, who had scratched and bruised themselves most miserably, and who so far forgotten even the voice of their Shepherd as to run away from him when he came near. The Good Shepherd, with quick eye to detect the missing sheep, and swift feet to go after them, and strong hands to drag them out of the pit, and bosom broad as Providence to warm them in, and the great fold of Truth and Love to protect them in the night against the wolves.

And the most beautiful institution which Christianity has given to the world is the institution of shepherds. The most beautiful office it has established is the pastoral office. Among the beatitudes which it has set the representative of Religion was called a Priest; his business was to offer sacrifice for sin. The institution of priesthood is pagan; it is grounded in the idea that men are saved by sacrifice; that there is an immense distance between God and man; a distance which God cannot abridge because of His holiness, and which man cannot change because of his sinfulness; which can be overspanned only by the mediating priest, who stands midway, and passes up to the Mercy-seat the gifts designed to propitiate the Deity. Christianity has given the characteristic representative of Religion was called a Prophet; his duty was to proclaim the will of Jehovah. Among Christians the religious minister is called the Pastor; his office is to feed the sheep. Christianity abolished the priesthood, by making every man a priest to himself. The prophetic office rests on the idea that men are saved by truth, addressed to the reason and the conscience. Christianity, while accepting, has made subordinate the prophetic office, by offering the spirit freely, and constituting all the Lord's people prophets. It allows no supremacy of one over others on the ground of official sanctity; it allows no supremacy on the ground of intellect or knowledge or inspiration. The only authority it allows is on the ground of [illegible] service. The [illegible] master is [illegible] all, [illegible] greatest saint [illegible] pherd, [illegible] pastor. The [illegible] herd's [illegible] charge to feed the sheep.

How beautiful is the ideal of the Christian pastor! The man whose duty consists wholly in being a shepherd of souls, whose privilege it is to go about among men and women, to watch them, and serve them, and save them, so far as he can, from the wolves; to reclaim the erring, rescue the lost, feed the hungry, rest the tired, and keep them all within the constraining arms of the Infinite Love! Making them to lie down in green pastures, and leading them by the side of still waters; looking out from his watch-tower over the human pasture, ready of knowledge, discovering the fresh pasturage beyond the mountains and the floods, and helping their tender feet over the stones; lying with them under the stars when the night of fear and doubt comes down, and by day delighting to lead them away from their worn-out traditions into new Truth—a lovely ideal of life and of the possible relationship between human beings. What sympathy it suggests between human beings! What sense of human needs and capacities! What views it opens of the varied fields of knowledge, and of hungry people pressing in there, and feeding under the eye of the believing Teacher. But alas! how seldom satisfied! how hard if not impossible to satisfy! This feeding of the sheep, how few do it, even among those who make it the professed duty of their life! How few have the will, or the heart, or the power, to do it! How few have any conception of what it is to do it, even in some single particular, as for example the nurture of the mind by wisdom! As we look over Christian history, as we survey our fields of Christian life, it hardly seems to be said that the pastors have made it their chief duty to feed the sheep—to give them the largest and richest supplies of thought and sympathy, to consult their appetites and longings, to furnish them to-day with the best God gives; to-morrow to be on the look-out for fresh fields and pastures new. The task, evermore, has been to gather them into the sheep-fold of the Church, to keep them within the high, strong walls of doctrine, to shut them in behind the iron gates of authority, to draw upon them the thick bolts of observance. An abandoned place, in their eyes, was the world without; there were the ravening lions and the prowling wolves; there was the great sea of wilderness of ignorance and error, where they were always losing themselves, and could do little else than lose themselves. And when the shepherds saw any of these poor sheep wandering there, or even peacefully reposing or contentedly browzing there, they went out to bring them in. Nay, if they saw them feeding themselves eagerly on new truth, roaming over the domain of science, or philosophy, or literature, cropping the tender grass of newly discovered knowledge, walking every so assuredly along the dizzy line of discovery by which God leads up to the great table-lands of wisdom, straightway we see these pastors coming out to call them back, begging them to return; if begging will not do, commanding them; if commanding will not do, seizing them and dragging them back by main force, sending out arnies after them, hunting them down, torturing them, laying waste their fields, burning their homes, and putting them to death if they would not come back to the fold. To see how jealously the sheep have been kept in fold, one would be led to think it was always night in the world, or always winter. And small inducement for the most part was there to come back; for the feeding of them in the fold was precisely the last thing that was generously done. To keep them without food, one would say, must have been the purpose and endeavor. There was perpetual warning not to eat. This food was unwholesome, that was indigestible, the other was poisonous; the rest, for some mysterious cause, was forbidden. Their minds were allowed to peak and pine, their human affections were starved, and even their souls had to content themselves with the vision of imaginary banquets in the world to come. This, I say, has been the upshot of much of this large pastoral activity for so many generations. The shepherds seem to have been jailors rather than pastors. Their energies were spent chiefly in repairing the walls of the sheep-pen, seeing that there was no flaw in the doctrine, no loosening in the tenets, no breach in the observance. Many a flock was obliged to eat what was given it, not because it was what it was; the same dry straw and chaff, day by day and season by season; no variety of food being supplied, the food they craved with natural appetite being refused under penalties. This idea of the Church as a sheep-fold is penalties. This idea of the Church as a sheep-fold is one of the most attractive, but at the same time one of the most delusive that can be entertained. It never other makes it the sacred duty of some people to govern other people up: it brings the wide outer world of Providence under suspicion, that a little enclosure on a hillside may be made holy. It encourages a mean opinion of human nature, as if it was a thing to be overlooked, and followed, and taken care of. It perverts Christ's ministers into turnkeys and tyrants, who, under guise of protecting against wolves, keep their charge secluded from the finest privileges of existence; and, under the name of feeding them, deprive them of their most needed sustenance.

There was a time, perhaps, when the Church needed to have a visible sheep-fold; there was a time when its walls and gates and bars and chains were required; there was a time when the pastors could do little else than shepherd the sheep, and the pastors could do little else beside shut people up in close observances, limiting their thoughts to the creed, their aspirations to the prayer-book, their movements to sacramental actions. But that time, we believe, is past.

Except the Church of Rome there is no fenced sheepfold now. The huge gates of ecclesiastical authority are broken down, the bolts and bars are rusted, there are great breaches in the walls of doctrine, and the sheep pass in and out at will, cropping the grass where they can find it greenest and tenderest. We have discovered that there is no infallible statement of doctrine, and we have discovered that Christ's sheep are not to be known by their being in any definite fold, but, as Ruskin says: "by their sheep-like behavior; and a great many are indeed sheep, which on the far mountain side, in their peacefulness, we take for stones." The pastor himself has no authority over a single lamb, to put it in the fold or to keep it out, one hour after it wishes to go out. He may not put his mark on it; the distinction between the Church and the world has removed; the whole earth is fast becoming fair pasturage ground. No single man can be the shepherd of any considerable flock in this large Christian way. No class of men can do all this work of feeding bodies, minds, hearts, souls. Every man must act as pastor in his own little flock, among the members of his household. Every man must be feeding with his own life those dependent on him, his children, his servants, his laborers, making himself responsible for their welfare; not sustaining the life in their bodies only, but sustaining the life in their immortal spirits, and, as teaching and ministering daily. Yet here are the sheep. Who are the shepherds? All are shepherds. The Church is a body to be taught and fed, as well as to teach and feed. All are pastors who can act as such; all are pastors to some portion of the flock.

In this criticism of Pastors and Churches, my friends, do not let me be understood as saying that this beautiful and peculiarly Christian work of feeding the sheep has never been done well and faithfully. It has been. Christian lands have been blessed by many shepherds, true pastors of humanity; but these have not in all cases been ordained pastors. They have simply been good and faithful men, no wiser, perhaps, than others; certainly with no special authority or power, only with their deep sense of responsibility for their weaker brothers and sisters. I see the disciples of Saint Lazarus in the East, gathering into their houses of refuge the lepers, who, outcast of all men, and a horror to all, infested the city suburbs. I see, in Spain, Peter of Nolasco and his brethren, devoting themselves to the redemption of captives, and living themselves on the scanticst supply of herbs and milk, that they might have more to give to the poor unfortunates who languished in foreign dungeons. I see a Bishop, employing his revenues for the ransom of prisoners, going in search of the poor sheep among the Turks, wearing chains there, a slave himself. The people of his Church send him a sum of money to buy his release; he thanks them for it, and devotes it to the purchase of women and children, staying in the prison-house himself. I see in Germany and France the dear women who gave their lives to the rescue of unhappy girls, whose lapse from virtue had left them to perish in misery. Pure women, the shameful memories of these frail ones with the tenderest words; they disguise their turpitude under the sweetest names. They call them "Daughters of the Good Shepherd," "Daughters of the Madeline," "White damsels," from the white garments they wore, and the pure associations they kept about them. In Guatemala, a brother of the Order of St Francis is touched by the sight of a poor sick sheep wintering in a cave in a shaggy herd. He obtains from charitable persons a little cabin, and starts a school there; he builds a little hospital, and brings into it the maimed and diseased. Meeting a poor old lame negress, whom her master had abandoned, he takes her on his back, carries her to his little infirmary, and goes about asking alms for her support. The funds of the rich pour into this good shepherd's hands; the cabin of the negress becomes a superb hospital, and though she lived but a short time after being taken into that fold, the mercy which had been shown to one of the least of the human species was rewarded as amply as if it had been bestowed on the Master himself. I see the Fraternity of Bethlehemites, with their vow of charity, poverty and hospitality, pledging themselves to serve the poor, though they were infidels and afflicted with contagious diseases, and serving them among the mines of Mexico and Peru. I see the nuns of the Hotel Dien in Paris, seeking the miserable outcasts who wandered forsaken in the lanes of that splendid city; they gather them into their shelter, feed them, clothe them, bind up their bruises, cure their diseases; patient, powerful, tender, baffled by no difficulties, discouraged by no failures, deterred by no rebuffs or indignities. I see them leaving the city, penetrating the indescribable ignorance and filth of the remote country districts; exploring the rude, unattractive villages, serving the most coarse and lowly as physicians and nurses; always tender, always feminine, and always dignified and firm in their self-respect. I see the noble Vincent de Paul, at first literally a shepherd, then a slave at Tunis, afterwards the priest illustrious for his knowledge and his deeds, who established seven or eight hospitals for the sake of the merest remnant of humanity. I see the Monks of St. Bernard dooming themselves to a life among the icy solitudes, and to an early death, that they might save here and there a stray lamb lost amid the snows.

Undoubtedly it was work like this that Christ bade Peter do when he said to him, "Feed my sheep." He meant that he should give them human sympathy, instruction, hope, cheer; not the husks of barbarous divinity; not the dry letters of Scripture, from which the vital sense had been carefully threshed out; not the hard, juiceless dogmas of tradition; but the food they needed—light, if they needed light—comfort, if they needed comfort—rebuke, if they needed rebuke; at any rate, food—that which would nourish them, make them grow, fill out their nature to its complete dimensions, make men and women of them, redden their blood, help them enjoy their work, their liberty, the privileges of their rational being.

There are always sheep enough to feed; sheep that are continually losing themselves; sheep that do little besides lose themselves; sheep led astray by false and hireling shepherds; sheep abandoned by false and hireling shepherds, and left to starve when they have been well fleeced, and it is too much trouble to shear them. I am speaking with a purpose, and to a point, my friends. I have my eye now on the immense flock, already more than 15,000 large, and swelling at the rate of a hundred or more every day; black sheep—black in the had sense, as many think—which crowd about the army encampments, make their way through the lines, and stray about in the towns and villages that are occupied by our troops. They come up out of pitfalls and swamps; they have pushed their way through swamps; they have struggled through tangled thickets. Their fleeces are ragged; their eyes are wild and fearful; their feet are bleeding from contact with the jagged stones. Poor dumb creatures they seem to be often, and yet endowed with the unerring instinct which tells them where there is better pasturage and more kindly care than they have known. Scanty pasturage have these unfortunates had hitherto in those rich Southern lands; barely enough to keep soul and body together (I beg my pro-slavery friend's pardon; I forgot for the moment that I was only speaking of sheep). Who are not supposed to have souls, I mean now I have dropped the hint. I will continue the wild fancy. barely enough to keep the body in lowest condition for coarsest work—food for the mind being sternly prohibited, under severe penalties of fine and imprisonment; the intellect kept at starvation point, teachers excluded, books proscribed, the school-house an unknown institution; no nutriment for their human sympathies, which were exposed to dreadful laceration; no sustenance for their souls but the dreadfuls engendered dens, on which the cattle cannot graze, but can only dwindle and shrink; such nutrition flung to them from the express purpose of putting their human nature, religion in the form of an impious; sarcastic [illegible] and scraphic bliss hereafter, administered in [illegible] their mankind might be dragged into a state of [illegible] sibility to their earthly condition; no grain [illegible] about their nature and their life granted to them, [illegible] only the chaff of theology and the dry letter of [illegible] ture; very miserable food, even for those who have [illegible] constitutions, but less miserable for such as [illegible] them, except that there is one in the fold, and [illegible] every occasion against their getting out among the [illegible] voices of civilization in Ohio, New York, Massachusetts. They have made the walls high and the gates narrow. They have had their keen-scented hounds on the watch, their alarm bells, their sentries and pickets vigilant, alert, lest one of these little ones should [illegible] chance find a passage out and perish among the wolves. In their pastoral solicitude for the well-being of [illegible] charge, they have subsidized the very government [illegible] have enlisted the active cooperation of Northern politicians and citizens in their endeavors to save the sheep from their destruction. In their anxiety lest some of them should wander fatally from the fold, they have even called out soldiers, and have run the risk of bloodshed and revolution in our own cities.

Well, these tender pastors have now deserted their flocks, have left their sheep-fold unprotected, and the gates wide open; and lo! the sheep left to their own devices, which seem to be innocent enough, and to the devices of others, which unhappily are not so innocent. Simple, harmless, inexperienced, free for the first time without knowing what freedom is or what use to make of it, there they are by the thousand, straying up at us and imploring faces. By no means unexposed are they to wolves of a very ravenous sort, albeit some of them wear the sheep's clothing. Hunger and nakedness threaten them with their teeth; worse than these, these, idleness menaces them now that they are compelled to labor by the whip; and vice steals [illegible] ously among them, demoralized as they are by [illegible] long servitude, unsouled as they are by being for years ranked with beasts, tempted as they are by the unhallowed license which is to them. And here is not cause to fear that other wolves than these are prowling round them, in the shape of our own soldiers, who do not discharge their office of shepherd's dog in any very noble fashion. The new shepherds that are there in place of the old ones are not precisely [illegible] Charity forbids us to believe the worst we hear [illegible] time to time in regard to the conduct of the army officers at the chief points of Southern occupation; [illegible] they have treated the blacks with uniform abuse and contempt; that they have driven them cruelly from the lines of the camps; that they have made them work where they chose, that they have kept registers of them and their owners, thus fixing on them the idea that [illegible] as if they were dumb creatures; that they have [illegible] willing enough to return them into the bondage [illegible] which they have made their escape, and exceedingly unwilling that they should find their way into the free pasturage country of the North. We need not believe all this—though one who does believe it all cannot be reproached for hasty or uncharitable judgment. Is [illegible] enough to believe that these poor sheep have not been fed, are not fed, are not likely to be fed, perhaps [illegible] be fed by the generals of the Union. There are means of feeding them with anything but liberty, so that they do not and need not thank us for. They are, untended, unpastured, unemployed, even when they might be employed to advantage. The main stream [illegible] many a village which afterwards became a town [illegible] even a great city (I have heard it said of Boston [illegible] instance), has been laid out on the line of the sheep tracks; that being the easiest, surest and shortest way through the pastures or across the meadow-lands. How often, during the war, these sheep of ours would have shown us the shortest, surest and easiest way [illegible] the country; but we rejected the guidance of their unfailing instinct. We would not even [illegible] them as sheep!

Well, as I have said before, and as we all know, [illegible] are the unprotected flocks. Who shall feed them? Who is there to feed them but ourselves? True, [illegible] are not ours; we have no authority over them, to [illegible] or to hold them. There is no question as to what [illegible] shall do with them; we have no right to do anything with them; the only people we have a right to do anything with are their rightful masters; and for them there are several things to be done. But as for these poor sheep, our doing in their case must be doing for, not doing with; and when we speak of doing for them, we open the consideration of a great duty and a great privilege—a duty with which no duty interferes—privilege second to none in sacredness. For some months we have been working hard for the army; the work is pretty much done; the army is in better condition than ever was before. The "Enfans Perdus" of the "enfants trouvés" and very well-fed besides; and now the Great Shepherd brings into his new flock to be cared for, a flock of despised [illegible] such as Jesus wept over because they had no shepherd. The less the army has to do with them, the better; the army will feed on them instead of feeding them. The less the government has to do with them, the better; for no wolves or bloodhounds are so much [illegible] dreaded as government agents and contractors; [illegible] would fleece the sheep worse than the old oppressors. The work is for us—for the Christian people of [illegible] country, acting through their own voluntary associations, acting for the benefit of the ern city will have its organizations for sending cloth, food, implements, tools for agricultural and mechanical labor, machines, master-workmen, teachers, physicians, missionaries, into that newly opened region. Every Church will have its sewing circle, and at those circles the ladies' needles will sew the shroud in which the insti tution of slavery will be laid out for the grave. We must be ready to meet the appeal when it comes to us, as come it will, and that soon. Will our Christian civilization take for its symbol Mr. Palmer's statue of the Indian Captive? You know the statue. It represents a fair young girl, taken prisoner by savages, and for the first time set face to face with their barbarous homes. She stands with her hands bound behind her with cords, her face expressive of fear, horror, loathing, disgust; every sentiment giving place to that of abomination. So might a girlish refinement look on the dark-skinned barbarians of the South; but a manly civilization will show to them another front; it will give them in the confidence of its power to elevate and bless them in the spirit of its manhood. Blithe; its eyes will pass; its bearing will be free, its step elastic; its face shine with radiant hope, and moisten with tender tears; while we will be outspread to welcome them to a kind embrace; its hands will be open and hospitable; its voice will speak words of cheer. It will put aside its antipathies and repugnances, and deal with these people like freemen as they are; rejoicing, if it can, by going into the wilderness, save any who might have been lost, being grateful that it is permitted to receive any of the Great Shepherd's flock into its wide enclosure of Law and Liberty, of Light and Love.

A WOMAN'S TIMELY WORD.

The following pertinent and forcible paragraphs were sent by LIZZIE M. POWELL, of Ghent, at the Convention held in Albany. Why they have not appeared in our columns before it is difficult to say. Ed.

So long as there is a slave left in the land, and a man or woman who is indifferent to his condition, it must be the word of those who feel the sinfulness of slavery to try to uproot it, and plant in its stead the beneficent fruit of freedom. We can feel most keenly how slavery has leavened our whole nation, and how it has established its despotic sway, when we see how multitudes of strong men, even in this crisis, bow in silence before it. There is no other subject on which men are so fearful to speak; no interest in the government, which has been so tenderly nurtured as that of slavery; no class of people whose spirit has been so misapprehended, none who have been treated as so unworthy the consideration due to men, as Abolitionists. Men are now the unresisting minions of slavery, not because they love it for its own sake, but because so many years of complicity with the evil have weakened their power to resist it, and made them the subjects of a deadening infatuation. Their hatred of Abolitionists is analogous to that of the little child toward the physician who must apply remedies to an inflamed part. The little child suffers the pain, and shrinks from its outward visible cause, without the wisdom to see that the pain comes of the skillfulness of the hand, and not from the application of the healer; but in after years he blesses the hand that was stretched forth to save him. Slavery has made a burning, bleeding sore in our national body, and now this body writhes in torment at the touch of those who would and must cut out the cancer, in order that life may be sustained, and purity restored. What matters it, however, that the air is heavy with imprecations against the faithful physicians. What matters it that Abolitionists cannot be understood, but instead are hated and hissed? Are not these years the hatred of the child is displaced by the love of the man, so in the good time coming, when the sore place is healed, the world will crown with love and gratitude the faithful surgeons and physicians. We all crave the benedictions rather than the curses of our fellow-men, but the desire uppermost in our hearts should be to bless.

It seems to me that in the one fact that Abolitionists are working for the well-being not only of the slaves, but of those who, like little children, are unconscious of the good that is in store for them, there is enough of comfort to sustain them through an eternity of effort and self-denial. Those who are with us in this work feel sure that, while they pity or despise the Abolitionists, they themselves deserve all the pity, because they cannot know the brightest light, the deepest joy, the profoundest peace of life, which is to consecrate ourselves to living for our idea of truth. We must be thankful that, in the recent months of intense agitation, many lips have been unsealed in condemnation of slavery. Congress is transformed into a convention for the discussion of slavery. Newspapers all over the country are advocating the close of the war by the abolition of slavery. For all these cheering manifestations of progress every Abolitionist must be devoutly thankful. We should accept them as results accomplished before our eyes, to strengthen, if need be, our faith in the sure triumph of truth. Let us receive them in humble thanksgiving, but our eyes must not be blinded, by the light coming from them, to the fact that the spirit of the administration is indifferent to slavery. The distinctive work of Abolitionists is to lead the way in the progress of the nation up to the point of seeing the iniquity of slavery, confessing to the sin of the past and present complicity, and of ceasing to do evil. Short of this the Abolitionist must not stop, because he sees that it is our moral duty to emancipate the slaves. He is the watchman set upon the tower, and must never hold his peace, day nor night, till he establish justice. And every word, whether of commendation or condemnation, should be prompted by a spirit all radiant with the light of love and truth. If our own souls are right, we shall work untiringly and hopefully. Can there ever be a consummation of this struggle, when we know that God has established the laws by which we work? For the Abolitionist there can be "no such word as fail."

ANTI-SLAVERY IN EASTERN NEW YORK.

GREENE, N. Y., March 15, 1862.

To the Editor of The National Anti Slavery Standard.

SINCE the early part of December last I have attended to extended series of anti-slavery meetings in different portions of Eastern New York, engaged chiefly in a colportage service, distributing anti-slavery tracts and circulating petitions to Congress and the State Legislature. Our last meetings were among Long Island, where we received the kind cooperation of those true and faithful friends of the cause, Joseph and Mary Post. For their generous aid and liberal hospitality we are under great obligations. The effect of the recent victories, in this locality, as elsewhere, was painfully evident in the reluctance and indifference manifested in signing the petition asking for the abolition of slavery under the war power. The masses of the people passively trust to the Administration, and fail to recognize their own prerogative and the responsibility which rests upon them to dictate a policy which shall lead to the establishment of a government based upon the eternal principles of justice and humanity.

On our return from Long Island we attended the Monthly Anti-Slavery Prayer-Meeting at Dr. Cheever's church. It was most gratifying and refreshing to notice the prompt and hearty response when their attention was called to the petition now in circulation to the State Legislature. The signatures of those present were heartily given, and arrangements made for an extensive circulation of it throughout the city. "Like priest, like people." Dr. Cheever has been faithful in exposing the sins of the nation, and with a power and zeal like that which inspired the prophets of old, has called the people to a speedy repentance. No one can listen to his burning words of warning and rebuke without feeling that earnest and constant effort is demanded of every individual soul in this great struggle. Thus we see that this Church stands, in contrast with others in the land, a working power against the national iniquity.

I am told that in Henry Ward Beecher's Church few of those to whom petitions have been presented have been willing to give their signatures.

In the light of the new responsibilities and opportunities presented to this people to put away the avowed sin of slavery, who can affirm that the judgment passed upon the Church by Abolitionists is not verified by its present impotence and apathy? It has failed to lift up a moral standard of justice and humanity, educating the people rather to acquiesce in a confessed sin, trusting in compromise, and hence in this hour of trial and suffering it can give no moral support to the nation. The sudden revelation which one, who makes appeals through the country for practical anti-slavery effort, is called to witness, is the conviction that the conscience is such unpardonable crime. The moral sense of the nation is paralyzed, deadened. When the demands of justice are presented, we are told that such measures are not politic, a larger number can be reached by softening and diluting the truth—and so, as a people, we wander further and further from God and his high purposes. As yet we have little evidence of a genuine, national repentance. The patriots must hope for defeats rather than victories, until the nation shall learn through suffering what it would not by the voice of its prophets.

ANNA RICE POWELL.

Our Washington Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, March 17, 1862.

I DON'T know but Wendell Phillips may have been in Washington before on pleasure or private business, but it certainly seemed to me Friday morning as if an angel had dropped down from the sky! Yes, Mr. Phillips walked into the Senate-chamber upon the arm of Senator Sumner. It seemed as if the very atmosphere of Washington would sully that man's garments, and to see him walk in quietly through the door which had often admitted a Toombs, a Davis, an Iverson, was to give one, as they say out West, "a realizing sense" of the wondrous change which has been wrought within a year. Mr. Phillips came in and sat down on one of the sofas in the lobby, where, in the days of his youth, the Republican Senators visited him. Everybody tried to catch a sight of him, and soon the whisper ran through the gallery, "Wendell Phillips is on the Senate floor," and the gallery-audience rose to get a sight of him. After a short tarry in the Senate, he was taken over into the Representatives' Hall by Mr. Alley of Mass., and there, too, he received the same cordial treatment. It was an amazing as well as wonderful sight. The man who has been almost more Democrat than any living man, unless I possibly except Wm. Lloyd Garrison and John Brown, was actually "holding leves" on the floor of the House, while the business was going on! Of course, these little personalities are nothing in them——es. I despise a Jenkins. But these little facts are stated as an indication of the miraculous change which is even now going on in Washington. The moment that Mr. Phillips was seen, and it was known that he would lecture, the cry arose for "tickets for the lecture!" The first man to catch the excitement was Vice-President Hamlin. While Phillips was upon the floor of the Senate, he sent a page instantly to inquire of some one connected with the Lecture-Association where he could obtain tickets for the evening's entertainment. His question was asked by many others, and before night hundreds of people provided themselves with the necessary means to obtain admission to the lecture-room of the Smithsonian Institute.

Of the lecture delivered there I will not speak at length. A large proportion of the readers of THE STANDARD know better than I or any one else can tell them how Wendell Phillips talks. How he enchains, delights, rouses up an audience. Both lecturer and audience succeeds. Nothing like them, in style at least, has ever before been heard in Washington. The lecture-hall was packed to the verge of suffocation, and many went away unable to obtain seats. At least five-sixths of the persons present were men who have been accustomed to regard Mr. Phillips as a dangerous or deranged man, yet he carried his entire audience with him. There was not a single sentiment uttered which met with a solitary hiss, scarcely one which was not vociferously applauded.

What does this mean? Congressmen, place-holders, citizens of a slave city most enthusiastically applauding an old-fashioned Abolitionist! Doubtless, something must be set down to the matchless oratory, but not all. The simple truth is that a vast revolution in sentiment is going on, has been going on for a year, until we have at last freedom of speech on slave soil! This is absolutely true. There is real freedom of speech in Washington to-day. Wendell Phillips says what he pleases to the largest audience which can be crowded into any hall in the Capital; and not only is this tolerated, but the audience is wildly enthusiastic over the speech and the subject chosen by the orator. It has been proposed that Mr. Garrison shall close the series of lectures, and it certainly would be a fitting close to the series. There would be no danger of a failure were he to come, for he would fill the hall to its utmost capacity, and would be received as cordially as he ever was in Boston.

There has been some exciting talk in Congress upon the slavery question since my last letter. There was a day's debate in the House over the President's emancipation resolution—in favor of aiding such slave States as will initiate emancipation. Nearly all the slave State members oppose the plan. All the leading and influential men from those States—unless I except Fisher of Delaware—are bitterly opposed to it. The Democrats generally range themselves, as you have seen, with the members from the slave States. The so-called "Democracy" is true to its old pro-slavery instincts. Nothing will drive the negro hate out of these fellows. Not even death or hell can do it—in fact only God alone by a miracle can do it. No matter if slavery has raised a rebellion that will crush the nation for a century, the Democrats will have that same slavery cared for as of old. There is no use for a government or a Union, unless slavery is to be protected, according to their notions.

There was a famous debate in the House on Wednesday between Wadsworth of Kentucky and Bingham of Ohio. It was the great debate of this session. Wadsworth is an old Clay Whig, a Unionist, talker of his fashion, cousin to a Barnum, Bright or Breckinridge Union man, but saucy, insolent, dictatorial, and somewhat witty and able. He said, "I spit upon the proposition of the President—I will not accept it—I reject it for Kentucky." This was the tone of the speech so far as the Presidential proposition was referred to, but it was not its worst feature. In case of any interference with slavery, he threatened further revolution in Kentucky, the Union men participating in revolution number two. The spirit of his speech was very ugly and diabolical. Bingham replied to it in a most needed punishment, and he administered it most thoroughly. Bingham always speaks well, but this time he fairly beat himself. It was one of the most magnificent off-hand speeches ever delivered in Congress. I actually felt pity for Wadsworth, he was so terribly cut up. It was the Merrimac against the Cumberland, only with this difference—in this case the sinking ship hauled down her colors! Bingham charged him squarely with being a rebel and a secessionist. Insolent as the Kentuckian was in making his speech, when Bingham made his reply he was in such distress that he seemed to beg for mercy. The whole House gathered round to see the punishment well laid on, and to see the truth vindicated.

Wadsworth made a great ado over a phrase in a previous speech of Mr. Bingham, in which he alluded to slavery as an "infernal atrocity." Bingham in reply said:

"I repeat the word which so moved the gentleman from his propriety, that which so disturbed his equanimity, the word which I used in the first place, I think, in speaking of the institution of slavery. I mean the word infernal. It is a logical sequence, sir, disguise it as you may, from that golden rule which was given in the first utterance of all of us, 'whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.' I do not yet mean to depart away from the law of that rectitude, yet men are dragged reduced to the condition of chattels in a strange land, where it is made a crime by statute to teach them the grand stirring words of John Milton, 'Give me the liberty to know, to argue, and to utter freely, according to conscience, above all liberties'; words worthy to be spoken by him who walked in his singing robes immortal, and breathed through every ear, heard and interpreted to every man, that he has a conscience, a right to know his duty, and a right to do it. Yes, sir, you may call me what you please, I will not stand to wage war upon the Union, if you interfere with the rebel's right to his slave, or with the rebel's code that it shall be a crime to teach the slave to read God's word. But there is a God that takes notice even of the sparrow's fall, and hears the young raven when it cries. Yes, sir, the conscience concludes to clothe with superhuman power the good right arm of an outraged man when he strikes for the liberty of himself, his wife, and children. For, sir, these rebels in arms, who have forfeited all rights, save the right to a gallows, doom four million of men to chains and slavery; subject them to sale to market over the world. I say to the father: 'Your little child that prattles its lisping words upon your knee is only our chattel, and will be sold with our pigs and our mules.' I say to the mother of your children: 'Your babe must be sold to another. The victims of this infernal conspiracy are the native-born children of the land, and yet these rebels to wage war upon you. Their rights in their slaves must not be touched, or you violate the Constitution. I stand by my words, and denounce the system as infernal atrocity."

This was one of the finest rejoinders ever made in Congress, in House or Senate, even if we include the days of Calhoun, Clay and Webster; and Wadsworth wilted under it.

There is a great deal of talk about McClellan here now. Is he disgraced? Did the President mean to disgrace him for his recent order? So far as I can learn, it is true that he was relieved from his general command because Mr. Lincoln was very much dissatisfied with his "strategy," which was developed in the hundred mile retreat of the enemy from Manassas. But further than this Mr. Lincoln will not go. He wishes to give Gen. McClellan an opportunity to save himself. That opportunity is afforded him now, and we may expect to hear of some heavy fighting or rapid running before March closes.

There is so much war-talk here that the anti-slavery and confiscation measures before Congress do not receive their due share of attention. The Tax bill will occupy the House for some time. Meantime, the Senate will pass a emancipation bill for the District of Columbia, and some sort of a Confiscation bill. This is certain—everything else in the line of emancipation measures is uncertain.

AYON.

Philadelphia Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, March 17th, 1862.

OUR army, events and the cause are all moving; pari passu—and "double quick" at that. It requires the chronicler to be as busy as the commissary to keep up with their march. Fremont has been reinstated in command, and his proclamation gives him the "edicts of vantage." On the mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee, with a comparatively free population around him, he has direct access to the very heart of slavery.

Gen. McClellan has been razed in his command; the check-reins have been taken out of his hand, and he himself has been put under the whip of public opinion, and the spur of Presidential command. The decision of the council of Generals, at which he was represented by Gen. Marcy, has been made of no account and, like "Joe" in the story, he is ordered to "move on." He has moved on; and, marching toward Manassas, has found—what? The game sprung, and, to his fancy, an apparition in its place, with its thumb on its nose, its fingers making mocking gyrations!

It is now evident, that for the last three or four months, Gen. McClellan has been occupying a post which, by right of fitness, has not belonged to him. He is an organizer, a disciplinarian, a strategist; a drill-master General, not a General-in-chief. The work he has rendered to the country, in forming, equipping and systematizing our vast army, has doubtless been great; and had he been content, when that was done, to take a secondary position, his laurels would now be green, and he would be one of the most popular men in the army. As it is, he has lost the reputation with which he began, and the task of recovering it will not be easy. It is said that he has lost his ear to political intriguers, and allowed himself to be managed with a view to the next Presidential election. The belief prevails, from information from the fact that the slavery-conserving politicians seem to have taken charge of his reputation, and that whatever he does or omits meets their heartiest approbation.

The first duty of a good General is understood to be the establishment of a good system of espionage. He can do nothing till he acquaints himself, to the fullest extent possible, with the situation of the enemy, his numbers, his resources, the lay of the ground he occupies, his capacity for defence, etc., etc. To do this he must encourage desertion from the opposing ranks, and welcome all comers. This latter Gen. McClellan has not done; but just the reverse. As a consequence—as developments now prove—he was in utter ignorance, not only of the numbers and resources of the enemy, but of important topographical facts and strategical disadvantages in his location.

Our papers, to-day, praise the General's proclamation. Well, let them praise it who can. It is strange that a document, which to one seems a weak, egotistical, and pompous production, should be lauded by another as a brilliant and high-toned specimen of military literature. What business has a General, on the eve of an anticipated engagement, to be talking to his soldiers about "this sad war"?

The policy of excluding fugitive slaves from our lines was about the best "aid and comfort" our Generals could, by any negative action of theirs, have given to the enemy. In the present case it put a Chinese wall between us and the rebel army. They knew all that transpired within our lines, and were nothing of what was going on in theirs. As the result, our huge army has been waiting for six months in inaction; decimated and demoralized by disease and vice; while the nation has been footing the bills at the rate of a million and a half a day! Partisan spirit may render some insensible, for the time, to the shame of our defeat (for defeat it is), and to the burden of the debt; but in future both will be remembered with mortification and bitterness. When we shall be sipping, here, our tax-tasting tea, sweetened with our slavery-suggesting sugar, we shall acknowledge the justness of the penalty of our blind attachment to the system. Thanks be to God for his righteous retributions! We kiss, in reverence, the hand that smites us!

But McClellan is taken down, and those Generals who refused to lead are now compelled to follow. Heintzelman, Sumner, McDowell and Keyes, the members of the council who were not afraid of "mud," but who were afraid of being placed in command of an army "dormie," and "On to Richmond," or to the Rappahannock, or the Rapidan, or wherever the enemy is to be found, is now the word. Our army, extending along a line of near 3,000 miles, is like the soul of John Brown, "marching on." By land and sea our forces encompass the enemy. Secessia is surrounded, and Upas is being girdled. Its withered leaves are falling, and its sap is turned backward. The flat that dooms the system has been pronounced, and—the Clerk of the House has made the record.

The vote on the President's emancipation message has not yet been taken in the Senate, but the affirmative is expected to be still larger, in proportion, there, than it was in the popular branch, where it stood, 88 yeas to 31 nays. The principal objection made to it by Senators is the very obvious one that it does not go far enough.

A new article of war has been adopted by a large vote of Congress, and approved by the President, prohibiting our officers, on pain of being dismissed from service, from returning to their masters fugitive slaves.

By late advices we learn that blacks, in large bodies, are flocking in to our lines, bringing with them valuable intelligence, and desiring to be serviceably employed. One writer reports having seen fifty in a body, with their faces turned freedom-wards and their looks reflecting the joy of their hearts at their deliverance.

And Wendell Phillips has been to Washington! and was introduced by Mr. Sumner on to the floor of the Senate! and the Vice-President descended from his dais to greet him! and other distinguished members of Congress came forward to welcome him! Wendell Phillips has at last lectured in Washington!—in the largest hall in the city, to an overflowing house, and to an enthusiastic and admiring audience! If, in less than four years from this time, the place of either of the present justly distinguished Senators from Massachusetts should, from any cause, become vacant, and Wendell Phillips should not be chosen to fill it, it will be because Wendell Phillips has no desire for the honor.

Mr. Phillips has the reputation of a radical; and he is radical he certainly is; but a true patriot, or a farther-seeing statesman, this country does not know. The services he has rendered the State and nation will be graven in marble, and cherished in the hearts of a grateful people. And the duty of acknowledging these services will not be wholly remitted to the next generation.

A certain Abolitionist used to remark: "If I could once see Wendell Phillips in the United States Senate, I would be ready to say, nunc dimittis, domine." I fancy, from my knowledge of this gentleman, that if the desired time were now come, he would be like another friend, who, when asked, in view of some good news that had been received, "Don't you feel like saying, 'Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace?'" answered, "No, indeed; I want to stay and see it out."

As a Pennsylvanian, I am not in high feather to-day. McClellan has "come down like a stick," and Cowan makes us ashamed. The indignation excited by this new Senator's first Quarter Sessions speech in apology for Bright, have been confirmed by all subsequent developments. We are in for it for five years; the first year of his term being only just completed. From a private letter now before me, from a member of our Legislature, I quote the following:

"Cowan is heartily despised by the men that elected him, and could not get a corporal's guard to run for any office, much less a candidate before the Legislature. The pro-slavery Democrats, and here and there a fossilized, conciliating Republican, commend him, but nobody else. I only get some sharp raps before the discussion on the Senate resolutions (in favor of emancipation in the District) are disposed of."

How this tyro, unknown to the State, should have jumped from the box of a Western County Court to the floor of the United States Senate, is to some a mystery; but the mystery is solved by the very terms in which the case is stated. The very fact that Mr. Cowan was unknown to the people of the State was the thing—with other favoring circumstances—that elected him. Omne ignotum pro magnifico. The people took him at his village friends' estimate, and till he spoke in the Senate, they never "found him out." The rationale of his rise is now obvious. He was a leading man at his little bar, and that made him a junior. He had collected a student of horses and shown a taste for natural philosophy, and that made him a man of science. He was a greater reader and was better informed than his neighbor competitors for lyceum honors, and that made him a learned man and an orator. So Mr. Cowan, coming to Harrisburg from Westmoreland County, with the reputation of jurist, scholar, and orator, was chosen Senator for the long term; and our only comfort now is, that at the end of five (!) years we shall have a chance to be rid of him. The Republicans who allowed such shoddy to pass through their fingers without detection and exposure should be looked after by the Van Wyck Committee.

A neighbor of mine, being overhauled for the part he had taken in electing Cowan, said: "It was a mistake. I became convinced of that, the first time I ever saw the man—which was some time ago in Washington. He turned back on two feet of his chair and squirted tobacco juice upon the floor!" My neighbor is one who holds the doctrine that the manners of a pig are never found united with the sensibilities of a gentleman; and in the case of Mr. Cowan his inference, from what he saw at the interview referred to, was, that that gentleman's sense of decency was not such as to be shocked by the retention of a dishonored traitor, like Bright, as a member of the Senate.

And this reminds me of a conversation with another neighbor of mine; a gentleman who enjoys—or, rather, endures, and that, too, with an air of grace—the distinction of being brother-in-law to the Confederate Envoy extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to "the purlieus of St. James." This gentleman, who is habitually free in the use of irreverent epithets, always allows himself unusual license when speaking of "Jim Mason." On the occasion referred to, he had been congratulated on the success of a motion of his in court, for an injunction restraining a creditor from drawing money from the Chew estate in Germantown, an income which he had acquired by marriage. "Yes ——— him, I have stopped him. The inflated puppy has been strutting, and affecting the airs of a gentleman on money he had no right to. But he is estopped now, the ——— rascal." "But, Colonel, is he not a gentleman?" asked a by-stander, not solely from a desire for information. "Gentleman! ——all I have to say is, if you ask him home to dine with you, you must look out that he doesn't get his feet on your mahogany."

Some allowance is perhaps to be made for the bitterness of my neighbor's antipathy on this subject; but it is very certain that the aristocratic airs affected by this pretentious slave-baron have little more to justify them in the man's outward refinement than they have in his internal probity.

Our Legislature, as already intimated, has had under discussion a resolution, instructing our Senators and requesting our members of the House to vote for the abolition of slavery in the District. The resolution passed the Senate by a hearty vote, and was hurried through the House, unless prevented by some additional matter which was incorporated in it by a Senate amendment.

The resolution has created a great deal of discussion, and elicited some able speeches. The Legislature this year embodies an unusual amount of speaking talent. The leading men in the Senate are Irish and Penny of Alleghany, Landon of Bradford, Lowvis of Erie, and Hiestand of Lancaster, all good men and true; also Ketcham of Luzerne, an uncommonly able debater, and also a good anti-slavery man, and McClure of Franklin, who to the reputation of being the strongest politician in the State adds that of being one of the least scrupulous. In the House, Williams of Alleghany maintains his ancient prestige for learning and ability; though there are others who in debate are in no wise his inferiors.

At Washington, while Cowan has been blatant, Wilson, owing to sickness and absence, has been silent. In the House, Judge Kelley, Morris Davis, John Hickman and Thaddeus Stevens have made speeches distinguished alike for their ability and fidelity to the cause, while other members from this State have contributed their fair share to the interest and value of that body's discussions.

On the other side of the water the state of things is all that we can ask. We have no complaint to make of England. The best leading organs and vehicles of opinion there—daily, weekly, monthly and quarterly—including among the latter even the Westminster and North British Reviews, acknowledge and justify their leanings to the side of the secessionists on occasions as no trouble. The best people in England are with us, and the nation as such is right; and that is all, so far as we are concerned, we care for.

The Anti-Slavery Advocate, always able and interesting, is, in its last issue, unusually good, and improvingly pro-American. Its talented and warm-hearted editor has not been able to see eye to eye with us in our national matters of late discussion, but the difference between us is nothing to speak of—"and his soul's marching on." In this number he admits that: "It is likely that there may be some in England who fear the victory of democratic principles, etc." In due time he will learn that it is a fact that there are some who entertain these fears. He will also learn, after awhile, that the admiration expressed and still cherished here toward Commander Wilkes, for the capture of Mason and Slidell, was not an anti-British, but an anti-secession feeling. He will also learn that the antipathy felt in this country to aristocratic institutions has no reference, so far as his readers are concerned, to "treatment." Our objection to lords spiritual and lords temporal, and to the unequal distribution of property and power implied in their existence, is not based on any impression, erroneous or otherwise, of "grinding and oppressive" exactions on the part of these noblemen. We are not ignorant of the private virtues which adorn many of the British aristocracy, nor of the elegant manners which are said to distinguish the whole class. Our friend's argument must take a different range if he means to cure us of what, for his sake, I will call our democratic "prejudices."

M.

TIMELY ADMONITION.

To the Churches and Religious Associations of Chester and Lancaster Counties, Pa.

WE feel impelled respectfully, but most earnestly, to call your attention to the present awful condition of our country. The direful calamity which is now scourging the land, and making such fearful havoc with human life, we regard as the legitimate offspring of the system of slavery.

The fearful retributions of Divine and Eternal Justice are now upon us because of this evil thing, and we believe that nothing short of its removal can enable us to escape them, and secure firm and lasting peace to our distracted land.

The events of the present rebellion give our government the legal power to abolish the system which has caused such desolation; but the time in which this action will be practicable is rapidly passing away, and woe be unto this nation if the opportunity now so signally given for performing this act of imperative justice should not be improved.

Congress and the President must be stimulated and sustained by the voice of the people before they will act; and we therefore earnestly beseech you, as religious bodies, to concentrate your influence in the community, to labor in this most Christian and important work, by all the means you may deem right and proper.

We would suggest the propriety of petitioning our legislative bodies in the name of your Society, or otherwise, and of calling conferences to examine what measures should be taken at this critical and solemn hour, so to arouse and enlighten public sentiment that liberty may be secured to those long and unjustly deprived of its blessings, and these heavy judgments be turned away from our land.

We feel a strong conviction that if we of the North now perform our duty faithfully and actively, the one bitter source of hatred and division will be removed from our midst, and that such a sword of justice will be the means of saving human life, and of finally harmonizing and cementing the Union of our beloved country.

Thus only, we believe, can we secure the blessing of a just and holy God, and prevent our professions of liberty from being a mockery in His sight; and in this way alone can the nation—exalted by righteousness—enter upon a full and glorious career of united interest, prosperity and happiness.

On behalf of a Committee appointed by the Clarkson Anti-Slavery Association.

THOMAS WHITSON,
JOSEPH MOORE.

OBITUARY.

DIED, at his residence at Philmont, N. Y., on Friday, March 14th, of congestion of the lungs, SOLOMON C. BARTON, in the 71st year of his age. Another of our tried and faithful friends, the earnest, conscientious and warm-hearted friend of the slave and of the colored man, the champion of universal justice and of a world-wide humanity, has passed on to the next sphere of life. His life has been for many years a potent, emphatic testimony in favor of impartial freedom, without respect to complexion or sex, and also a vigorous and most effective protest against bigotry in thought, and its accompanying narrow, sectarian, proscriptive prejudices. He lived largely for his fellow-men. His last labor was that of securing from his fellow-citizens an expression, by petition, for the immediate, unconditional abolition of slavery. He leaves an affectionate family and a large circle of warmly attached friends who feel keenly his removal. A. M. P.

DIED, in Matanzas, Cuba, on the 26th ult., of consumption, R. FLORENCE CLENDENON (late of Concord, N. H.), wife of William G. Clendenon. Six months ago, a bride, she sought in that tropical clime the boon of health, denied her here; but all too late; the Death Angel claimed her, and her pure spirit has entered upon the higher life.

Although not an active laborer in the Anti-Slavery cause, it had her deepen, warmest sympathies; and to every ardent aspiration, and earnest effort of humanity for freedom and development, she responded a hearty Good speed.

"Oh! who can forget the mild light of her smile,
Her frequent outpouring of kindness and joy,
The eye's deep enchantment, dark, dream-like and clear,
In the glow of its gladness—the shade of its tear.

"And the charm of her features, while over the whole
Prayed the spirit of life, the pure spirit of soul,
And the tones of her voice, like the music which seems
Murmured low in our ears by the Angel of dreams.

"As a cloud of the sunset, slow melting in heaven,
As a star that is lost when the day-light is given,
As a glad dream of sunshine, which wakens in bliss,
She hath passed to the world of the holy from this."

THE WASHINGTON LECTURES.—William Goodell, we observe, has been invited to deliver a lecture in the Washington course. Rev. Hiram Mattison of this city is the lecturer for the present week. He will speak of the American Churches in their relations to slavery; a very important theme. WM. LLOYD GARRISON has been invited, we understand, to give the closing lecture; and we hope that he will not, except for most imperative reasons, fail to embrace such an opportunity to serve the cause to which his whole life has been devoted.

SOUTHERN MORALS.—A correspondent of the Charleston Mercury writing from Richmond, says:

"The City is full of officers and soldiers on furlough. A hundred whisky-shops are in operation on Main street and the side alleys. Drunken men reel out, tumble into the gutters, spread out upon the sidewalks, vomit, blaspheme, fight and quarrel, and sometimes indulge in those deadly conflicts which fill our hospitals and graveyards. Some of these grog-shops should be done to stop this all over the Confederacy. Not only should the distilleries be abolished, but every drop of whisky, except such as is needed for the hospitals, should be poured upon the earth."

WHAT SLAVERY DOES.—Out of sixty-eight Confederate prisoners, taken by Capt. Oliver at the Blue Springs engagement, Tenn., Jan. 4th, twenty-three could not even write their names. The written vouchers for this fact are in the hands of the Provost Marshal. The proportion of these prisoners from Fort Donelson, who cannot write, is notorious. This is one of the saddest fruits of slavery, and of the character of those who compelled it, and of the rebellion, which this war has yet revealed. A free and popular government cannot prosper with an uneducated people, and the tendency of masters to keep their slaves in ignorance.—Missouri Dem.

FREMONT.—The Rev. J. S. C. Abbott, in the course of his lecture before the Washington Institute, said:

"And there is another of our unfitted rubbles, whose execrations an unworthy spirit of [illegible] is rive, for a time, slightly to have been scattered. It is [illegible] forth again with increased fury; a noble who has opened a path to the heart of his countrymen, and who has pointed out the path for the speedy and effectual overthrow of this rebellion, and who seems to have recognized in Abraham Lincoln a kindred spirit, bearing the simple and appropriate motto, 'The Pathfinder.'"

MAKING ENEMIES OF FRIENDS.—The Washington Republican says:

"The rebels have been our friends at all points at the South. In no single instance have they been treacherous, or acted a false part. Their information has not always been correct, and it has often proved to be, from their position and ignorance, but has always been given in good faith, and has frequently been invaluable. This is the truth of the case, and we publish it for the benefit of our young readers, library for adventure, ambitious for sudden wealth, will stifle their convictions and risk their lives in its infamous service. I do not speak of those who have been middle aged and grey hatred men who are said to belong to the organizing band of slave-traders in this city—because my sympathy is not large enough to extend to them; yet may I ever find a place in their defense the pernicious sophistry of gospel ministers?"—New York Cor. Springfield Republican.

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

Receipts for The Standard from Feb. 1 to March 1, 1862.

Rev. A. D. Sableiu,	Boston,	Mass.	$3 00
Rev. Wm. A. Rice,	"	"	4 00
1831 J. M. Forbes,	"	"	3 00
1858 Mrs. Samuel May,	"	"	2 00
1112 Fred. Abbot,	"	"	2 00
1848 Albert M. Chase,	"	"	2 00
1797 Grace H. Austin,	"	"	4 00
1110 Thomas Groom,	"	"	2 00
1777 Sarah Child, Barnstable,	"	"	2 00
1776 Seth Hunt, Northampton,	"	"	2 00
1144 Rev. R. White, No. Fairhaven,	"	"	4 00
1145 Rev. Mary Rice, Dorchester,	"	"	2 00
1144 L. Borden, Fall River,	"	"	4 00
1152 Miss A. F. Filton, Worcester,	"	"	1 00
1182 Miss Ann Ellis, Reading, Conn.,	"	"	2 00
1182 Fem. A. S. Soc'y, Plymouth, 15 copies,	"	"	20 00
1155 L. Stevens,	"	"	2 00
1182 Miss Harriet Parmenter, Lowell,	"	"	2 00
1180 H. A. Ware,	"	"	2 00
1156 Dr. S. Cutter,	"	"	1 00
1156 Caroline Cornwell,	"	"	1 00
1156 Amos Goodale,	"	"	1 00
1156 A. A. Eastman,	"	"	1 00
1092 Miss A. W. Weston, Weymouth,	"	"	2 00
1173 Mrs. H. C. Pifield,	"	"	2 00
1180 Abner Lincoln, Hingham,	"	"	2 00
1142 Rev. W. W. Howard, Flathush, L. I.,	"	"	1 00
1134 A. Williams, New York City, N. Y.			1 73
1157 H. Gardner, 2 copies,	"	"	2 00
1120 R. Lamb,	"	"	4 00
1160 Jas. Floy, Jr.,	"	"	1 00
1184 Thos. L. Taylor,	"	"	2 00
1182 Rev. Jos. F. Hussey, Peckskill,	"	"	2 00
1137 J. Ricketson, Academy,	"	"	3 00
1152 Mary Morey, Saratoga,	"	"	1 00
1130 A. D. Wright, Deer River,	"	"	2 00
1127 A. S. Lawrence, Lowell,	"	"	2 00
1126 Mrs. P. H. Jones, Albany,	"	"	2 00
1180 B. F. Smith,	"	"	2 00
1158 Jas. C. Dunham, Newburg,	"	"	2 00
1180 Mrs. Phebe Mann, Milton,	"	"	2 00
1136 E. Cady Stanton, Seneca Falls,	"	"	4 00
1144 Rev. Wm. Ellis, Lockport,	"	"	1 00
1160 Rob. B. Neall, Mt. Holly, N. J.			2 00
1142 Nettie A. Stray, Strodes Mills,	Pa.		1 00
L. Bacon,	"	"	2 00
1180 Geo. H. Johnston, New Alexandria,	"	"	4 00
1180 Erra Borton, Tedrow,	O.		2 00
1156 Wm. B. Johnston, Connotton,	"	"	1 00
1172 Wm. W. Brown, Salem,	"	"	2 00
1182 Geo. W. Nye, Walnut Hills,	"	"	1 00
1165 Wm. Edgar, Athens,	"	"	1 00
1160 J. M. Ross, Ft. Wayne, Ind.,	"	"	2 00
1176 Gilpin Brooke, Marlboro,	"	"	2 00
1180 Ansel Miller, Akron,	"	"	2 00
1180 James Sabin, Randolph,	"	"	2 00
1173 Amos Williams, Jr., Cleveland,	"	"	2 00
1180 Jas. Haswarth, Logansport, Ind.			2 00
1180 E. Tomlinson, Magnolia, Ill.			2 00
1180 Jas. Ferguson, Rome, Mich.			2 00
1100 Francis Shepard, Cedar Grove, Iowa.			2 00
1179 Dr. S. J. W. Tabor, Independence,	"		4 00
1154 Daniel Pound, Boulder City, Neb.			2 00
1156 Asel B. Caldwell, Washington, D. C.			1 00

AARON M. POWELL, Agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society, will speak at

BEDFORD, N. Y., Wednesday, March 26.
BEDFORD, N. Y., Thursday, March 27.
NEWCASTLE, N. Y., Friday, March 28.
NEWCASTLE, N. Y., Saturday, March 29.
CROTON LAKE, N. Y., Sunday, March 30.
CROTON LAKE, N. Y., Monday, March 31.
WEST CHAPPAQUA, N. Y., Tuesday, April 1.
MAMARONECK, N. Y., Thursday, April 3.

Miscellaneous Department.

FOR THE ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD.

MASSACHUSETTS AND MOULTRIE.

MASSACHUSETTS.

When from the Border States came amain
Old soldiers were lying in Baltimore slain,
How did New England then honor her brave?
Sons were laid down tenderly, here be their grave."

Banners waved over them, music's and tones
Of hail to a loyal State mourns for her sons.
"Was there another tone, murmured aside?
'Twas the deep vengeance-vow breathed in each heart.

Green will their graves be kept, cherished their fame,
All who behold them will honor the name.
Ay, land of the traitor! thy streams will run red
Before Massachusetts forgetteth her dead!

MOULTRIE.

Long have they waited, the conflict is come.
Now for your native land, Southron, strike home!
Say that their cause was wrong—yet at that word,
Young forms to battle sprung, high hearts were stirred.

Fast over Moultrie's wall poured shot and shell,
Woe to the soldier there who fighting fell.
Haply some may have smiled, yielding their breath,
Dreaming of fadeless fame, purchased by death.

Blazon our victory! Sumter is won!
If bloodshed wrought it, war it, we'll wear there was none.
Should any question their fate, anxious-hearted,
Blacken their very name, say they deserted!

Oh woe to the land that dishonors her slain,
That pours out her best blood, and pours it in vain.
Alas! for the high hearts that trusted and bled,
Betrayed are the living, forgotten the dead.

May, 2, 1861. MARGARET WYNDE.

THE ANCESTORS OF WASHINGTON.

[At the Public Breakfast of Americans in London, on the recent anniversary of Washington's Birthday, the Rev. J. SHPKINSON was introduced by the Chairman, Mr. McIlvaine of London, in these terms: "Our celebrated historian, Mr. Jared Sparks, has acknowledged his great indebtedness in reference to the history of Washington and his family, to the Rev. J. Simpkinson, rector of the parish in this country where the family from which our honored patriot descended, for 11 years, resided, in Northamptonshire. He has searched into and brought to light details, with regard to that family, of very great interest, and I hope that in seconding the toast which has just been spoken to, he will favor the audience with some particulars that have come to light through his researches."]

THE REV. J. SIMPKINSON said—Right Rev. Sir, Ladies and Gentlemen: It is somewhat embarrassing for a man in my position to stand before such an assembly as this to respond to the toast which has been proposed. I could scarcely believe that the toast had fallen into the hands of a man competent to deal with it—for instance, the Earl Spencer, whose letter has been read to you, and who expressed to me personally his great sorrow that he could not attend your meeting (cheers). I have, indeed, I am speak repeatedly of America and the Americans in terms of most cordial admiration. There is only one thing which consoles me in being obliged to speak to you. It is that, perhaps, being neither a Northumbrian, I may be a better representative of the sentiments and feelings of an average Englishman; just as if you take a nut out of a bag you get a better representative of the whole than you do by making a selection. And I do not hesitate to say that, taking the mass of Englishmen, and above all among professional men, there is no name in the world's history that stands higher than the name of Washington (cheers). I do not hesitate to say that there is no Englishman in the civilized world to which England yields in admiration of his name and character (cheers). Our people are proud to acknowledge that there is no name which stands higher in the lists of humanity than that of your illustrious countryman (cheers). But our feelings must be like those of a person who looks over his neighbor's hedge and sees a magnificent tree, the pride and glory of the forest. We know that tree belongs to your neighbor, and not to us. No jealousy to that feeling. The object is too great to allow any petty feeling of jealousy to be entertained. We admire that giant specimen of our common humanity (cheers). But, sir, in another respect, we are like a person looking over his neighbor's hedge. We are proud when we look at the giant stature of the tree to know that some of its roots have strayed over the hedge, and struck into our own soil. We are proud to know that in the roots of that tree are under our feet we have some sort of share in the growth of that noble tree—that we have contributed—are contributing now to its enlargement and sustenance. It is with this feeling that I venture to contemplate the name of Washington. The Right Rev. the gentleman informed you that I come from Northamptonshire, the county of the Washingtons and the county of the Franklins. In the church of which I have the honor to have charge lies buried the last Franklin and the last of Washington—who died on English soil and whose relics are committed to us as a sacred deposit. Numerous Englishmen and Englishwomen visit our church for the express purpose of seeing his tomb. They feel a deep interest in what we can show them. It touches a chord of sentiment in every true English bosom. And when I look down, as I do in passing through the church, on the stars and stripes of the arms of Washington, nothing will ever persuade me or my parishioners—whatever some Americans may try to do—that we do not possess the proof that your glorious and world-renowned country took the suggestion for its flag from those arms. When I see the three stars on the bar of the escutcheon which is striped gules and argent, or in plain English, red and white; when I see the five pointed stars, not six pointed, which is peculiar, nothing will ever persuade me that we do not possess the original of the stripes and glorious stars of your banner (cheers). The circumstance I speak of induced me some years ago to set to work to see if I could trace more of the connection of the Washingtons with our parish and county, and bring out some points of interest to myself. I touch very briefly upon those points, and I could not count on the sympathy of those who are not in the same position as myself. Still, you will no doubt rejoice to hear something of what I have to say about the ancestors of the Washington family. Northern family who lived some time at Sulgrave, and also in Lancashire. It was from Lancashire that they came to Northamptonshire. It was a pleasure to me to be able to point out what induced them to come to Northamptonshire. The ancestor of the first Lawrence Washington was the great Sir Francis Kitson, one of the merchants who, in the time of Henry VII. and Henry VIII., developed the wool trade of the country. That was the great industry which led to the growth of wool, and the creation of sheep farms in the midland counties. I have no doubt, therefore, that the reason why Lawrence Washington settled in Northamptonshire, having his own profession, which was that of a barrister, becoming a wool merchant, was that he might superintend his uncle's transactions with the sheep proprietors in that county. Lawrence Washington was a man of ability and integrity, and he soon became Mayor of Northampton, and at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries, being identified with the cause of religious liberty, he gained a grant of some monastic lands. Sulgrave was given to him by Henry VIII. Sulgrave was in the connection which existed between him and my parish of Brington. My parish is part of the Spencer estate of Althorpe. The Lady Spencer of that day was a Miss Kitson, daughter of Washington's uncle, and the Spencers were great promoters of the sheep farming movement. Thus, then, there was a very plain connection between the Washingtons and the Spencers. The rector of the parish at that time was Dr. Layton, who was Lord Cromwell's prime commissioner for the dissolution of monasteries. Therefore, we see another cause why the lands of Sulgrave were granted to Lawrence Washington. For three generations they remained at Sulgrave, taking rank among the nobility and gentry of Northamptonshire, and the seed of three generations their fortunes failed. They were obliged to sell Sulgrave, and they retired then to our parish of Brington, being, as it were, under the wing of the Spencer family. The Lord Spencer of that day was a very noble character. That Lawrence Washington died in the year 1606, is, I think, proved by various points. We look upon the house in which the Washington family lived in the time of their adversity with pride, and we rejoice in the hope that the Spencers will always love to keep it up as the great ornament of their estates. From this depression under which they suffered, the Washingtons recovered by a singular marriage. The eldest son of the family married the half-sister of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, which at that time was not an alliance above the pretensions of the Washingtons. They rose again into great prosperity. I was reading the other day, in Mrs. Thompson's life of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, a curious story of the familiar relations in which the children of George Villier's family used to have with the family of James I. A contemporary letter says that the little children of the family used to lounge about like so many rabbit-starters in the palace of the king. I wrote to Mrs. Thompson to ask her if she could prove that these children were little Washingtons. She said she could not prove it, but she entirely agreed with me that they must have been (laughter). There were no little ones connected with the family of George Villiers, who would answer to the description of "rabbit-starters," except they were Washingtons. There is a still more interesting fact, which I read in the letters of Howell, who says that at Madrid, when Charles I. went there on his strange mission to woo the Infanta, there was a page in his retinue named Washington, who died at Madrid. During his illness, he was sadly tormented with by Roman Catholic priests. Sir H. Verney one day seeing a Catholic priest visiting him, ejected him in a manner not satisfactory to the priest or those placed in authority. Washington died, and being refused sepulture in the cemetery, was buried in the ambassador's garden. I think there can be no doubt that that Washington was the brother of the emigrant. About the emigrant I am not able to discover much. Nothing is ever mentioned of his family in the papers of the Spencers, showing the intimate terms on which they were, down to the very time of the civil war. When the civil war broke out, the Washington family, and the civil war broke out, the Washington family, and the Spencers, they would have taken the side of the parliament. Probably we all of us feel that the cause of the parliament was on the side of the right and liberty. I am no doubt, could have joined the parliamentary side. But do not blame the Washingtons for joining the royal side—that side which symbolized to them loyalty and patriotism, and all the great constitutional of their ancestors. It was an error, it was a glorious error—an error with which I have great sympathy. You all know the name of Lawrence H. Washington, who defeated Worcester. We have it, on high authority, that he was a wonderful fellow, and well known for his bravery, that it became a proverb in the army whenever a difficulty arose: "Away with it, quoth Washington." The emigrant, of whom I lose sight in 1657, I leave to be followed by your own historians on the other side of the Atlantic. Now, I think I have shown you that we have a right to feel proud that we can trace under our feet the roots of your noble tree. I remember when I was a boy, I thought it was a wonderful thing that the name of Washington did not appear more in the books I read. I saw plenty of Gates and Lee; but when one gets older, one learns to see the grandeur of the position which Washington occupied—content to occupy a position which never could be seen by future: content to work silently, while others were occupying a more prominent position—content to serve his country without a shadow of ambition. He has always appeared to me in that respect like the great and good man whose loss all England deplores, Prince Albert. They were just like one another in the simplicity of their character, in their entire freedom from vanity and pride, and in their willingness to remain unrecognized by all (hear, hear). The only princely name which stands on a level with Washington's is that of William the Silent. I forget whether your great historian Motley has drawn the parallel. It is one which deserves to be drawn, I think. The name of William the Silent is the only one which stands on a level with that of Washington. I will not detain you longer. But may I not say in allusion to what fell from your Bishop at the Colonial Sees. Jamaica, that I believe that the citizens of America in their different conjunctions will be able to follow the example of the great and glorious man whose anniversary we are now celebrating. I forbear to speak of the state of things now existing in your country, because I fear to say what might be inappropriate. Allow me to say in the name of all those who regard what is going on, that we feel profound sympathy and profound respect for your nation. I hesitate to express what sympathy and respect would fail me to show the deep respect we feel. But, in conclusion, let me say I trust your statesmen will have grace and power to follow the example of the great man whose birthday we celebrate. Follow the course of Washington, and you cannot have a nobler man to follow (cheers). May I say in allusion to his arms that I trust you will always bear in mind his three stars—the star of truth, the star of patriotism, and the star of trust in God (loud cheers).

SPEECH OF GEORGE THOMPSON, Esq., At the Public Breakfast of Americans in London, Feb. 22, 1862.

[MR. THOMPSON seconded the toast, "The President of the United States of America."]

GENTLEMEN: I cannot say that I am wholly unaccustomed to public speaking, but this I can say, that addressing meetings like the present is by no means my hobby, and I have frequently rather shunned gatherings of this kind than sought attendance at them; and still less have I ever felt inclined to make meetings like this an opportunity of stating my private sentiments. I cheerfully compented, however, to respond to the toast of "The President of the United States," because I thought that it would be a great discharge an individual feeling, and that I could, at the same time, speak with some authority with regard to the feelings of my countrymen at large. There has not been before the world, for the last two years, a man whose position has more to excite sympathy than the President of the United States of America. I have bitterly mourned over the course taken by many of my countrymen, who, ignorant of the circumstances in which the President is placed, have censured his measures, brought unfounded charges against him, and rebuked him for weakness and hesitancy, when I had reason to believe that he was not justly liable to any of those opprobrious epithets. I felt that, in giving this toast, I should have declined to have any connection with it, in the way of recommending it to an audience like the present, because it is not my wont to discharge these mere formal duties; but I felt that I could do so in my own conviction, that Mr. Lincoln is peculiarly entitled to our sympathies, our respect, and our admiration, whether he be regarded simply in his own private character, or as the elect of a great nation, or as the representative of a peculiar situation as chief magistrate of the United States at this moment (cheers). On behalf of the people of this country I may take it upon myself to say that—whenever they are fairly and fully informed with regard to the circumstances in which Mr. Lincoln, as well as every subordinate office-bearer in the United States, is placed, by his obligations to observe the Constitution of that country, and by the very oath which he takes when he is inducted into his office, that the heart of the truth has been fairly and fully spoken there has been at once a withdrawal of those imputations that have been thrown upon the President. I believe that this country never fairly considered the circumstances in which Mr. Lincoln was elected, nor are they aware, as they should be, of the nature of the obligations he has assumed. The people of this country are but imperfectly acquainted with the Constitution of the country and the oath which this assembly belongs. Many have an impression that the chief magistrate is individually empowered to do whatsoever he pleases with regard to that great question which lies at the root of the present unhappy condition of the country. He is censured if he does not exert that power. If they do not ascribe to the President that power, they at least believe that the Congress possesses it. Whenever they are told that neither the President nor the Congress has the power to do so, they are at once competent for our Parliament to do, seeing that they could determine whatever measure they pleased—whenever they are informed of the real state of the case, they can understand much more the real circumstances in which the government of the United States is placed. With regard to the sympathy of the people of this country with the North, I assert that so far as the indications of public opinion have fallen in the meetings I have held, and in private intercourse with them, I have scarcely ever discovered, when the truth has been fairly placed before them, any difference with the people of the North now engaged in this great conflict (hear, hear). If anything would have tried the loyalty of the people to their principles in regard to freedom, it is the recent adversity that has upon our manufacturing districts through the suspension, and, in fact, the entire stoppage, of one of the greatest branches of manufacture in this country. Yet from the various meetings which I have attended in Manchester and its neighborhood, I am able here to declare that there is the greatest and most noble spirit of sympathy and loyalty to the principles of this country (loud cheers). Again and again I have put the question pointedly and in the plainest and directest terms, "Will you hamper the government in its efforts to put down slavery?" and the reply from North, or at least distract their attention and engage them in two-wars at the same time by a precipitate recognition of these seceded States, or by attempting to break the blockade of the Southern ports?" The reply has invariably been the reverse (cheers). There is not a sentiment in the English mind at this time more powerful, and more universal than the sentiment of entire non-interference in the present state of affairs (hear, hear). I said that the sympathy was peculiarly on our sympathy. No other President of the United States—though each in his turn has had difficulties to contend with—was placed in circumstances so embarrassing as those in which Mr. Lincoln is placed. The Northern States are unanimous with rashness; the war has been imputed to them; the vices, the want of integrity, and the treachery which are ascribable solely to the South, have been almost invariably imputed to the North. Or it has been attempted to be shown that the very equally conspicuous for those foibles with the South. But when we look at Mr. Lincoln, called to Washington at a time when secession was already resolved upon, and all the means of rendering it an accomplished fact taken: when the act of secession had actually been made by some of the Southern States, finding himself in the Presidential chair at the head of a corrupted and in great part a treasonable army, with men around him in every department who were, many of them, declared enemies of the Constitution which he had sworn to preserve, we behold a man entitled under these circumstances to our collective and national sympathy (loud cheers). Whenever I have endeavored to judge the conduct of Mr. Lincoln, or his government, I have felt it my duty to place myself in the circumstances in which they are placed, to ascertain carefully what are their true constitutional powers, and what are the limitations of those powers—to place myself in their circumstances, and to judge what I would do if I were so placed, and what influence to my hopes and wishes and inspirations, but to my hopes and wishes and inspirations, but to my duty on the one hand, and my obligations on the other; when I have judged Mr. Lincoln by such a standard as this, he may not have done in every case that which I may have desired him to do, but I am here prepared to say, that I congratulate my American brethren that they have in the person of Mr. Lincoln a person preeminently entitled to their warm attachment and most cordial support (hear, hear, and cheers). No one can read his history without speaking of him in terms of admiration. He was first of all dependent upon his own industry; he then successively became a soldier, a lawyer, a representative in Congress, and President of the United States. Without abating one jot of my fervent loyalty to my own Sovereign, I congratulate you, that you live under institutions in America, which enable every poor boy, when he sees a gazes on the face of the President, to see in him a man who is, in fact, apparent to the throne (laughter)—for I see it so in the case of Mr. Lincoln, and what has happened to that orphan child will, I hope, often happen to distinguished statesmen in those succeeding generations in which the Union will last (hear, hear). I have constantly told that what is going on in America is the result of democracy running to seed, and that all the successes of democracy are proving its absolute failure. I have ventured to judge of democracy by the fact that at the end of seventy-three years from the time the Constitution was adopted a dispute has arisen, what shall we say of monarchy on the continent of Europe? (Cheers.) I prophesy that your glorious Union is eternal, and no cause of [illegible] of democracy, but because of a [illegible] principles of democracy (cheers). We [illegible] of the Richmond papers some mon[illegible] progenitors of their new government [illegible] government army, a privileged class, a throne [illegible] tion for voters, and, in fine, nothing was wanting but a crown or a coronet to make it a monarchical government altogether. I maintain, sir, that these principles are inconsistent with the great North, and that whatever disfigures the South, and disgraces the South, and brings upon it the just condemnation of mankind, is ascribable, not to democracy, but to the seed which was sown before the revolution had ripened, which has grown into a monstrous and contemptible oligarchy (cheers). I will not touch upon the question to which Dr. Fergnson has so beautifully referred, nor will I again sound the praises of my own countrymen; but this I will say, sir, that I have no doubt that the knowledge cognizant that there is at this time a larger number of persons interested in the cause of humanity and freedom in the South—men and women—who have made greater sacrifices and run more risks than have made in any other country, or in any period of our anti-slavery existence (hear, hear). We are too much misled by individuals, and the statements of persons in authority. This is not the best mode of ascertaining the truth of the public mind in the Northern States. It is not from newspapers published in Philadelphia or Boston or New York, that you can ascertain the true feeling that prevails in the New England and other States. You can only get that information as I have done, by travelling through those States, and ascertaining from the people, and judging from their own actions, what their real opinions are. I venture to express a hope that as events are now shaping themselves, and compelling the attention of the country rather than control them, not only that your Union may be restored and certain of your stars which are now eclipsed may appear in the field more resplendent than ever, but that, when that happy day arrives, you may not be the worse for the reestablishment of the Union at present severed by traitorous bands, and of your unrivalled Constitution, but that you may find that you have not only restored the Union and recovered your status as a great nation, but that you have purged the Union in such a way that it may secure also impartial and universal liberty (loud cheers). Of the success of the North I have no fear; I never had any fear (hear, hear). I could have had none without I had lost all faith in human progress and all belief in an overruling Providence. I know that the city of Boston alone could buy up North Carolina and all her slaves, and that New York could buy up Virginia and have 30 millions sterling to spare. We know the lighting propensity of Every inch of South, but I [illegible] North a display of virtue and a determination [illegible] shall be [illegible] I cannot [illegible] the [illegible] (hear, hear). You may [illegible] to express for a whole, [illegible] coming [illegible] the language of one of our poets:

"Like some tall cliff that rears its aerial brow,
Swells from the vale and midway meets the storm;
Though round its breast the gathering clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

The speaker resumed his seat amidst loud applause.

FOR THE ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD.

BE YE FREE!

BY WILLIAM T. URQUHART.

A voice from Heaven is sounding out this Western shore,
It rolls from mountain to mountain, and echoes back the roar;
It thrills alike to ev'ry heart, it speaks to you and me;
Awaken, all ye people, arise and be ye free!

I hear it 'mid the forests where our pines in sadness wave,
And where grim Winter, shiv'ring, sits within his ice-bound cave;
Each eastern valley, smiling, sounds aloud the joyous strain,
And Alleghany's mountain tops echo the glad refrain.

I hear it by the watchfires on Potomac burning bright,
Where the silver cimitar gleams in the eye of light;
I read it blazon'd on the flag whose silken folds still wave
Over our firm embattled hosts, the true-hearted and the brave.

I hear it mid the turmoil of the wild and desp'rate fight,
Its whispers steal around me in the long and gloomy night,
Where in the late contested field, all strewn around I see
The corpses lain of heroic souls, who died to make us free.

Vainly ye strive to check, ye foes of Freedom's onward stream,
Whose waves like liquid sunshine all with light and glory gleam;
FIX'D is the Heavenly purpose, changeless our God's decree,
Which speaks alike to all of us: ARISE, AND BE YE FREE!

EFFECTS OF SLAVERY ON WHITE MEN.

MR. G. BATELLE, a member of the Western Virginia Constitutional Convention, now in session at Wheeling, has published an address to that body on the question of Emancipation, which is worth more than it is an excellent document, full of sound sense, and contains some reflections on the evil effects of the slave system on the freemen among whom it exists, which are most true, as every Southern man must admit.

Mr. Batelle says:

"The injuries which slavery inflicts upon our own people are manifold and manifest. The interests of the people are constantly another race, but our own race. It inserts in its bill of rights some very high sounding phrases securing the freedom of speech; and then practically and in detail puts a lock on every man's mouth and a seal on every man's lips who will not shout for and swear by the divinity of the system. It amuses the popular fancy with a few glittering generalities in the fundamental law about the liberty of the press, and forthwith murders every man who prints a line against the peculiar institution. It says to the press, and scoff out its edict to every journeyman, master, whether in the village or at the cross roads, clothing him with a despotic and absolute censorship over one of the dearest rights of the citizen. It degrades the press by giving it the badge of servility, and it impedes enterprise by withholding its proper rewards. It alone has claimed exemption from the rule of uniform taxation; and then demanded and received the Statute-book to be changed so that taxation shall be uniform. It is any wonder, in such a state of facts, that there are this day, of this system, men enough from Virginia, mainly by this system, men enough with their descendants, and means and energy, scattered throughout the West, of themselves to make no mean State?

"It has been so a fellow observer, and I will add a fellow sufferer, with the members of the Convention, that we have felt the influence of slavery among us has been formed. We have seen it nurtured, to inaugurate, in many instances, all too successfully, a reign of terror in times of profound peace, of which Austria might be ashamed. We have seen it fostered in our midst, in spite of our general prosperity and fruitful soil, and exhaustless natural resources, some of the men of the very best energy, talent and skill among our population. We have seen also in times of peace, the hand of violence and outrage, and even of murder, put down, and the perpetrators escape, by the freedom of the press abolished—and the willing minions of this system, in hunting down their victims, spare from degradation and insult neither the young, nor the gray haired veteran of seventy winters, whose every thought was as free from offence against society as is that of the infant of days.

"And last but not not least, we have seen its own friends and favored interpreters, standing in the very sanctuaries of our political Zion, throughout the land, blaspheming the holy principles of popular liberty to which the very places where they stood had been consecrated, by dedicating my child and every man's child that must live by labor to a virtual and helpless slavery. And as the natural outgrowth of all this, we have seen this huge barbaric raid against popular rights, and against the world's last hope. It has been the merit of other attempts to extend institutions that their motive at least was a reaching upward and forward after liberty; it is the infamy of this that it is a reaching backward and downward after despotism. It would put back the hand on the world's dial a thousand years. It would put out the world's light in the darkness of utter and dreary despair. Surely, to the extent that we have suffered from these ills, our very manhood calls upon us to guard, by all reasonable preventives, against their return.

THE REFUGEES AT ROANOKE.

ROANOKE ISLAND, March 3, 1862.

THE far the number of fugitive slaves in our camps has not been large compared with the number of their maintenance a subject of prime importance. On Roanoke Island there were probably not more than seventy or eighty bondmen before our arrival, of whom the greater part are now in the harbor of Hampton which our lines afford. Applications have been made by the owners for their rendition, but Gen. Burnside has uniformly refused to accede to the demand, turning a deaf ear even to the protestations of loyalty which they make, on the ground that if they had been really loyal, they would have shown it when we needed the assistance they could have rendered.

Several boat-loads of fugitives have come at different times from Elizabeth City, Plymouth, Edenton, and other places, to the northward, all of whom report that hundreds are hiding in the woods and swamps, in daily expectation of our arrival. In now [illegible] the change [illegible] the number of our camp-followers, the contraband question promises to be as difficult of solution here as it has been elsewhere. [illegible] to propriety [illegible] and wo[illegible] The for[illegible] but the [illegible] by the government army, a privileged class, a throne [illegible] tion for voters, and, in fine, nothing was wanting but a crown or a coronet to make it a monarchical government altogether. I maintain, sir, that these principles are inconsistent with the great North, and that whatever disfigures the South, and disgraces the South, and brings upon it the just condemnation of mankind, is ascribable, not to democracy, but to the seed which was sown before the revolution had ripened, which has grown into a monstrous and contemptible oligarchy (cheers). I will not touch upon the question to which Dr. Fergnson has so beautifully referred, nor will I again sound the praises of my own countrymen; but this I will say, sir, that I have no doubt that the knowledge cognizant that there is at this time a larger number of persons interested in the cause of humanity and freedom in the South—men and women—who have made greater sacrifices and run more risks than have made in any other country, or in any period of our anti-slavery existence (hear, hear). We are too much misled by individuals, and the statements of persons in authority. This is not the best mode of ascertaining the truth of the public mind in the Northern States. It is not from newspapers published in Philadelphia or Boston or New York, that you can ascertain the true feeling that prevails in the New England and other States. You can only get that information as I have done, by travelling through those States, and ascertaining from the people, and judging from their own actions, what their real opinions are. I venture to express a hope that as events are now shaping themselves, and compelling the attention of the country rather than control them, not only that your Union may be restored and certain of your stars which are now eclipsed may appear in the field more resplendent than ever, but that, when that happy day arrives, you may not be the worse for the reestablishment of the Union at present severed by traitorous bands, and of your unrivalled Constitution, but that you may find that you have not only restored the Union and recovered your status as a great nation, but that you have purged the Union in such a way that it may secure also impartial and universal liberty (loud cheers). Of the success of the North I have no fear; I never had any fear (hear, hear). I could have had none without I had lost all faith in human progress and all belief in an overruling Providence. I know that the city of Boston alone could buy up North Carolina and all her slaves, and that New York could buy up Virginia and have 30 millions sterling to spare. We know the lighting propensity of Every inch of South, but I [illegible] North a display of virtue and a determination [illegible] shall be [illegible] I cannot [illegible] the [illegible] (hear, hear). You may [illegible] to express for a whole, [illegible] coming [illegible] the language of one of our poets:

"Like some tall cliff that rears its aerial brow,
Swells from the vale and midway meets the storm;
Though round its breast the gathering clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head."

The speaker resumed his seat amidst loud applause.

FOR THE ANTI-SLAVERY STANDARD.

BE YE FREE!

BY WILLIAM T. URQUHART.

A voice from Heaven is sounding out this Western shore,
It rolls from mountain to mountain, and echoes back the roar;
It thrills alike to ev'ry heart, it speaks to you and me;
Awaken, all ye people, arise and be ye free!

I hear it 'mid the forests where our pines in sadness wave,
And where grim Winter, shiv'ring, sits within his ice-bound cave;
Each eastern valley, smiling, sounds aloud the joyous strain,
And Alleghany's mountain tops echo the glad refrain.

I hear it by the watchfires on Potomac burning bright,
Where the silver cimitar gleams in the eye of light;
I read it blazon'd on the flag whose silken folds still wave
Over our firm embattled hosts, the true-hearted and the brave.

I hear it mid the turmoil of the wild and desp'rate fight,
Its whispers steal around me in the long and gloomy night,
Where in the late contested field, all strewn around I see
The corpses lain of heroic souls, who died to make us free.

Vainly ye strive to check, ye foes of Freedom's onward stream,
Whose waves like liquid sunshine all with light and glory gleam;
FIX'D is the Heavenly purpose, changeless our God's decree,
Which speaks alike to all of us: ARISE, AND BE YE FREE!

EFFECTS OF SLAVERY ON WHITE MEN.

MR. G. BATELLE, a member of the Western Virginia Constitutional Convention, now in session at Wheeling, has published an address to that body on the question of Emancipation, which is worth more than it is an excellent document, full of sound sense, and contains some reflections on the evil effects of the slave system on the freemen among whom it exists, which are most true, as every Southern man must admit.

Mr. Batelle says:

"The injuries which slavery inflicts upon our own people are manifold and manifest. The interests of the people are constantly another race, but our own race. It inserts in its bill of rights some very high sounding phrases securing the freedom of speech; and then practically and in detail puts a lock on every man's mouth and a seal on every man's lips who will not shout for and swear by the divinity of the system. It amuses the popular fancy with a few glittering generalities in the fundamental law about the liberty of the press, and forthwith murders every man who prints a line against the peculiar institution. It says to the press, and scoff out its edict to every journeyman, master, whether in the village or at the cross roads, clothing him with a despotic and absolute censorship over one of the dearest rights of the citizen. It degrades the press by giving it the badge of servility, and it impedes enterprise by withholding its proper rewards. It alone has claimed exemption from the rule of uniform taxation; and then demanded and received the Statute-book to be changed so that taxation shall be uniform. It is any wonder, in such a state of facts, that there are this day, of this system, men enough from Virginia, mainly by this system, men enough with their descendants, and means and energy, scattered throughout the West, of themselves to make no mean State?

"It has been so a fellow observer, and I will add a fellow sufferer, with the members of the Convention, that we have felt the influence of slavery among us has been formed. We have seen it nurtured, to inaugurate, in many instances, all too successfully, a reign of terror in times of profound peace, of which Austria might be ashamed. We have seen it fostered in our midst, in spite of our general prosperity and fruitful soil, and exhaustless natural resources, some of the men of the very best energy, talent and skill among our population. We have seen also in times of peace, the hand of violence and outrage, and even of murder, put down, and the perpetrators escape, by the freedom of the press abolished—and the willing minions of this system, in hunting down their victims, spare from degradation and insult neither the young, nor the gray haired veteran of seventy winters, whose every thought was as free from offence against society as is that of the infant of days.

"And last but not not least, we have seen its own friends and favored interpreters, standing in the very

NEW SERIES OF TRACTS

PUBLISHED BY THE

AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY

AND TO BE OBTAINED AT THE

Anti-Slavery Offices, 5 Beekman street, New York; 106 North-Tenth street, Philadelphia, and 221 Washington street, Boston.

No. 1. Correspondence between Lydia Maria Child and Governor Wise and Mrs. Mason, of Virginia. 5 cents.

No. 2 Victor Hugo on American Slavery, with letters of other distinguished Italians, viz., De Tocqueville, Mazzini, Humboldt, Lafayette, &c. 5 cents.

No. 3. An Account of some of the Principal Slave Insurrections during the last two Centuries. By JOSHUA COFFIN. 5 cents.

No. 4. The New Reign of Terror in the Slaveholding States, for 1859. 10 cents.

No. 5. Speech O'Connell on American Slavery; with other Irish Testimonies. 5 cents.

No. 6. The Right Way the Safe Way, proved by Emancipation in the West Indies and elsewhere. By L. MARIA CHILD. 10 cents.

No. 7. Testimonies of Capt. John Brown, at Harper's Ferry, with his Address to the Court. 2 cents.

No. 8. The Philosophy of the Abolition Movement. By WENDELL PHILLIPS. 5 cents.

No. 9. The Duty of Disobedience to the Fugitive Slave Law; An Appeal to the Humanity of Massachusetts. By L. MARIA CHILD. 5 cents.

No. 10. The Infidelity of Abolitionism. By WM. LLOYD GARRISON. 3 cents.

No. 11. Speech of John Rossack, convicted of a violation of the Fugitive Slave Act, at Chicago, Ill. 3 cents.

No. 12. The Patriarchal Institution, as described by Members of its Own Family. Compiled by L. MARIA CHILD. 5 cents.

No. 13. No Slave-Hunting in the Old Bay State: An Appeal to the People and Legislature of Massachusetts. 5 cents.

No. 14. A Fresh Catalogue of Southern Outrages upon Northern Citizens. 10 cents.

No. 15. The Martyrs of the Fugitive Slave Law and its Victims. By REV. SAMUEL MAY, JR. Revised and enlarged edition. 13 cents single, $10 a hundred.

No. 16. Tribute of William Ellery Channing to the American Abolitionists, for their Vindication of Freedom of Speech. 3 cents.

No. 17. Argument of Wendell Phillips Against the Repeal of the Personal Liberty Law, before the Committee of the Legislature, Jan. 29, 1861. 3 cents.

No. 18. A Voice from Harper's Ferry. A Narrative of Events at Harper's Ferry with John Brown, before and subsequent to its capture by Captain Brown and his men. By OSBORNE P. ANDERSON, one of the insurgent party. 10 cents.

No. 19. The Abolition of Slavery the Right of the Government under the War Power. 5 cents.

No. 20. The Loyalty and Devotion of Colored Americans in the Revolution and War of 1812. 3 cents.

No. 21. In Memoriam. Testimonials to the Life and Character of the late Francis Jackson. 5 cents.

☞ A deduction of fifty per cent from the above prices will be made where a dozen or more copies are taken. Gratuitous copies will be sent by mail, for examination, on receiving the postage charge.

Advertisements.

AMEROSE'S PATENT COAL OIL, NO-CHIMNEY BURNER, for Portable Lamps, Lanterns, etc.—This burner has been approved and highly recommended by persons who have used four good sperm candles. The light is not as strong as that produced by the chimney lamp, but is softer, and more agreeable to the eye. It consumes less oil than the chimney lamp—one-half pint of good coal oil lasting twenty hours—and produces none light